PREFACE

The 79th Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organization was held in Geneva from 3 to 23 June 1992.

The agenda of the Conference was as follows:

Standing items

I. Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.
II. Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

IV. Protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer (second discussion).
V. The prevention of industrial disasters (first discussion).
VI. Adjustment and human resources development (general discussion).

The Conference also had before it a Special Report submitted by the Director-General in application of operative paragraph 5 (a) of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the Conference in 1988 and revised in 1991, as well as a report on the subject by the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination, submitted in pursuance of operative paragraph 5 (b) of the Declaration.

The contents of the present volume constitute the Record of Proceedings of the 79th Session of the Conference in its final form. They are presented in the following order:

- a detailed table of contents;
- the Provisional Record, Nos. 1-31;
- a list of corrigenda to the Provisional Record, including corrections communicated in conformity with article 23, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders;
- the authentic texts of instruments adopted by the Conference;
- the resolutions adopted by the Conference;
- the revised list of delegations (including all corrections received within the time-limits specified in the Standing Orders);
- an index of speakers in plenary sitting.

Resolutions

Resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

Resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth, submitted by Mr. Bingen de Arbeloa, Employers' delegate, Venezuela; Mr. Cevallos, Employers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Durling, Employers' delegate, Panama; Mr. Gazarin, Employers' delegate, Egypt; Ms. Hak, Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Hultin, Employers' delegate, Finland; Ms. Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States; and Mr. Thüsing, Employers' delegate, Germany

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the conclusions and resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises adopted at the 72nd Session of the International Labour Conference,

Recalling also the resolution concerning the creation of enterprises and the growth of employment, which was adopted by the Fourth European Regional Conference in September 1987,

Recalling further the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Recalling that the standards of the ILO relating to employment aim at all forms of productive activity which provide means of earning a livelihood,

Convinced that a key to solving the problems of unemployment and underemployment faced by many countries lies in the creation of a favourable climate for the efficient utilisation of human skills, including entrepreneurial and management skills, and the exercise of individual initiative within the framework of policies that encourage the creation and growth of enterprises that are competitive nationality, regionally and internationally,

Noting that the potential for employment growth is particularly strong in small and medium-sized enterprises,

Considering that the entrepreneurial spirit thrives particularly well in an environment where markets and enterprises are free from excessive regulation and government interference,

Convinced therefore of the need for such an environment so that enterprises, including small and medium-sized enterprises, can fully realise their growth potential,

Noting that, in the framework of structural adjustment, the ILO and other United Nations agencies are increasingly called upon to respond to requests by member States for assistance to encourage and develop an entrepreneurial spirit, and to foster the potential for growth and employment through the private sector, especially in small and medium-sized enterprises,

Considering that technological developments and changes in world markets make continuing structural adjustments in the economies of all countries inevitable and that, because of their flexibility, small and medium-sized enterprises are particularly well-placed to respond to such developments and changes and to contribute to such adjustments,

Convinced further of the need to make enterprises capable of adapting rapidly to the market in order to facilitate the process of change in national economies in ways which maximise economic growth while encouraging job creation and sustainable employment, among other measures through training and retraining programmes;

1. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to:

(a) promote economic and employment policies which establish an environment in which enterprise can flourish, and self-sustaining new jobs and new small and medium-sized enterprises can be created;

(b) take appropriate measures to encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship, including through training and retraining programmes for unemployed people, new entrants to the workforce and those displaced by structural adjustment.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special emphasis, when implementing the programme of the ILO and when planning future activities, to:

  (i) activities that promote the development of appropriate national economic and employment policies that would encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship, especially in small and medium-sized enterprises, with a view to expanding sustainable and productive employment;

  (ii) training and retraining programmes directed towards enabling unemployed people, including new entrants to the workforce and those displaced by structural adjustment, to acquire the necessary skills and qualifications to start their own economic activities or to find employment or re-employment;

(iii) activities fostering the creation of new enterprises as a principal means of re-employing people who may lose their jobs in the process of structural adjustment, as well as providing employment for new entrants to the workforce;

(b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting as essential elements of their economic and employment policies a market economy, the encouragement of enterprise free from excessive regulation and government interference and the promotion of a more diversified economy, in order to increase opportunities for sustainable and productive employment.

Resolution concerning the settlement of industrial disputes, submitted by Mr. Bingen de Arbaloa, Employers' delegate, Venezuela; Mr. Cevallos, Employers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Durling, Employers' delegate, Panama; Ms. Hak, Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Hultin, Employers' delegate, Finland; Ms. Mackie, Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia; Mr. Oechslin, Employers' delegate, France; Mr. Owuor, Employers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Smith, Employers' delegate, United States; and Mr. Thüsing, Employers' delegate, Germany

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151),

Reaffirming the principles upon which these Conventions were based, especially the fundamental importance of freedom of association as the basis for an efficient and equitable system of industrial relations,

Seeking to promote voluntary mechanisms for the settlement of disputes between employers and their workers,

Concerned at the same time with the social and economic cost of industrial conflict both for those involved and for the stability and development of the country,

Noting that the basic instruments of the ILO on freedom of association and industrial relations do not address problems related to the equitable settlement of industrial disputes,

Convinced that appropriate voluntary mechanisms to promote mutually accepted solutions to industrial disputes are compatible with respect for freedom of association if they result from dialogue with those involved,

Desiring to reduce the negative consequences of industrial conflict, especially when this threatens public safety, or the welfare or economic development of the country;

1. Calls upon member States and upon employers and workers and their respective organisations to promote efficient voluntary mechanisms for the settlement of industrial disputes.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to request the Director-General to place at the disposal of the constituents of the ILO information and advisory services that would help them to develop and improve appropriate mechanisms for the settlement of industrial disputes;

(b) to consider placing the settlement of industrial disputes as an item on the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

Resolution concerning compensation for losses suffered by workers and employers because of the invasion of Kuwait, submitted by Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate, Kuwait; Mr. Al-Agami, Workers' delegate, Kuwait; and Mr. Hyder, Employers' delegate, Bangladesh

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Emphasising the major role of the ILO in defending the rights and interests both of workers and of employers, in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Preamble to the Constitution which advocates "protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own",

Bearing in mind the content of article 12, paragrapha 1, of the Constitution which states that "the International Labour Organisation shall cooperate within the terms of this Constitution with any general international organisation entrusted with the coordination of the activities of public international organisations having specialised responsibilities in related fields", which implies that international organisations should combine their efforts, each within its own sphere of competence, in order to consolidate their stand in support of the rule of international law as well as to ensure the triumph of peace and justice among nations and individuals,

Recalling the conclusions of the 279th Report of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, in respect of Case No. 1556, which pointed out that during the invasion workers and employers and their organisations in Kuwait had been subjected to atrocious practices involving assassination, injury, exile, the destruction of establishments and buildings, the burning and plundering of documents and assets and countless other acts of sabotage, in view of which the Committee requested the Iraqi Government either to restore the plundered property or else to pay just compensation,

Recalling what happened to approximately half a million workers and over 100,000 employers who, apart from losing their jobs, savings and property, were forced to flee collectively to their countries of origin, massing at the borders in uninhabited and unhealthy places, which caused the death of many migrant workers and outbreaks of contagious diseases among them,

Taking account of Security Council resolutions Nos. 686, 687 and 692 and of other related resolutions which, by virtue of international law, consider Iraq responsible for all direct or indirect losses suffered by governments, firms and individuals, belonging both to Kuwait and to other nations, as a result of Iraq's unlawful invasion and occupation of Kuwait,

Considering the pressing and difficult circumstances experienced by workers and employers, as well as their dependants, as a result of being deprived of their source of income, and stressing the fact that only with adequate compensation can they overcome their hardships and resume their activities as productive forces:

1. Calls upon the Iraqi Government to respect and abide by the resolutions of international bodies, and particularly those of the United Nations Security Countil with regard to compensation, and not to disregard resolutions on the international rule of law in this respect by preventing the United Nations Compensation Commission from selling Iraqi oil and retaining the proportion fixed for the compensation fund.

2. Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office to communicate with the competent authorities in the international Compensation Commission through the relevant bodies in the United Nations general secretariat and the Security Council, requesting them to give special priority to workers' and employers' compensation, and to submit reports to the Governing Body on the outcome of his efforts in this respect.

3. Invites the Governing Body to follow up the matter and report thereon to the 80th Session of the Conference.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers and their Families, submitted by Mr. Abakirov, Workers' delegate, Kyrgystan; Mr. Antoniou, Workers' delegate, Cyprus; Mr. Goncharik, Workers' delegate, Belarus; Mr. Klotchkov, Workers' delegate, Russian Federation; and Mr. Veronese, Workers' delegate, France

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Guided by the recognition, in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution, of the urgent need to protect the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own,

Noting the protection guaranteed by the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Equality of Treatment (Social Security Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143) and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and by the accompanying Recommendations,

Recalling further the resolution concerning action by the International Labour Organisation for migrant workers, adopted by the Conference in 1967, and specifically paragraph 3 of its operative part, as well as the resolution concerning ILO action for promoting the equality of migrant workers in all social and labour matters, adopted by the Conference in 1971,

Noting the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly in resolution 45/158 of 18 December 1990 of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families,

Aware of the growing importance and scale of the phenomenon of migration which affects millions of people and a large number of countries of the international community,

Considering however that, given demographic trends, the interdependence of labour markets and the need for greater cooperation between countries, the flow of migrants is both a challenge and an opportunity for the host countries as well as for the countries which supply labour,

Deploring that international migration systems in some regions embody practices that are incompatible with international labour standards, and considering that there is an urgent need to bring the recruitment and employment of migrant workers into line with those standards,

Observing that the absence of democracy, the violations of human rights, including trade union rights, the conflicts that exist in various regions and the transition of certain economies increase the number of migrants,

Deploring the racism and xenophobia to which migrant workers are often exposed,

Considering that migratory movements should be subject to international regulations so as to ensure uniform guarantees and protection of the rights of migrant workers and of their families, and convinced that prompt and vigorous action is needed to achieve full equality, in law and in fact, in all social and labour matters for migrant workers under both national legislation and collective agreements,

Stressing the urgent need to promote development assistance for the creation of jobs as an effective means of resolving migration problems,

Convinced that the ILO must be the spearhead of all initiatives concerning migrant workers aimed at reinforcing activities, relations and cooperation with various institutions within the family of the United Nations,

Believing, however, that special efforts can already be made in specific regions through bilateral or multilateral meetings under the auspices of the ILO,

Stressing the need for employers' and workers' organisations to be associated in the work of all national, regional and international bodies concerned with questions affecting migrant workers and members of their families;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to take all necessary measures to ensure that the terms and conditions of employment of migrant workers are in accordance with the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination and with the provisions of ILO instruments;

(b) to ratify and implement, in particular, ILO Conventions Nos. 97, 118, 143 and 157, and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families;

(c) to pursue actively the objectives of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), and to make an effective contribution to international assistance activities to reduce migratory pressures;

(d) to give full effect to the provisions relating to the protection of migrant workers formulated in the Declaration of Principles and Programme of Action adopted by the World Employment Conference, as well as in the resolution relating to its follow-up (1979);

(e) to take duly into account all pertinent national and international standards when concluding bilateral agreements on migration, and to respect the obligations arising under multilateral agreements and treaties, particularly those to which States have subscribed in the area of human rights and in favour of the free movement of men and ideas;

(f) to pay special attention to the serious human and social problems confronting migrant workers;

(g) to formulate and apply strictly laws and regulations to combat all forms of racism and xenophobia, and to intensify educational activities in that field;

(h) to organise educational seminars for migrant workers to inform them of their rights and obligations;

(i) to facilitate the role and participation of workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of policies regarding the recruitment, employment, working conditions and integration of migrant workers.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to intensify the activities of the International Labour Office with a view to guiding, stimulating and coordinating the efforts of member States so that they have efficient information, guidance and placement services for migrant workers;

(b) to urge member States to ensure equality of treatment in economic and social matters between national workers and migrant workers, particularly in all matters relating to remuneration, working hours, social security and freedom of association;

(c) to promote the dissemination of information on the rights of migrant workers and members of their family that are recognised in the relevant international instruments, and specifically on their right freely to join the trade union of their choice;

(d) to give due attention in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium to the need to increase the activities of the ILO aimed at the protection and promotion of the rights and interests of migrant workers and, in particular, to allocate the resources required for the Organisation to play its full role in the supervision of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families;

(e) to take the initiative to draw to the attention of member States cases in which the recruitment and employment of migrant workers are not in conformity with international labour standards, and to provide the necessary advisory services and technical cooperation to correct such situations;

(f) to take into consideration the promotion of the ratification and application of instruments relating to migrant workers in the technical cooperation and assistance programmes of the International Labour Office;

(g) to encourage and provide technical assistance for the conclusion of agreements and/or arrangements between States so as to protect the rights of migrant workers and members of their families;

(h) to present to an early session of the Governing Body an in-depth survey of the major features of the recruitment and employment of migrants in each of the regions and to submit proposals concerning action required to bring them into conformity with international labour standards;

(i) to convene at the earliest possible date a tripartite advisory meeting, involving the participation of all relevant United Nations agencies, to provide guidance on the future policies and activities of the ILO in the field of migration;

(j) to step up cooperation and coordination with the other specialised agencies of the United Nations and other international and regional organisations with a view to the preparation and implementation of programmes to help countries resolve the problems concerning migrant workers, employment and development.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to monitor closely the issues raised in this resolution;

(b) to consider the need to undertake in the near future a comprehensive study on the application of Conventions Nos. 97, 118, 143 and 157, to be submitted to the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations;

(c) to place the problem of migrant workers on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

Resolution concerning employment promotion as an essential component of development, submitted by Mr. Abakirov, Workers' delegate, Kyrgyzstan; Mr. Antoniou, Workers' delegate, Cyprus; Mr. Goncharik, Workers' delegate, Belarus; Mr. Klotchkov, Workers' delegate, Russian Federation; Mr. Veronese, Workers' delegate, France

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment",

Recalling the ILO's responsibility, according to the Declaration of Philadelphia, to promote programmes which will achieve full employment, and the fact that the Preamble to the Constitution of the Organisation advocates the prevention of unemployment and the provision of an adequate living wage,

Considering that the International Labour Organisation affirmed in the Declaration of Philadelphia that "the attainment of the conditions in which this shall be possible must constitute the central aim of national and international policy", and further affirmed that it was the responsibility of the Organisation "to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective",

Recalling the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987,

Recalling also ILO standards on employment policy,

Noting with concern the decline in employment opportunities in various regions of the world and the increase in unemployment and underemployment in several industrialised countries as well as in developing countries and countries in transition,

Recognising the need to ensure respect for the freedoms and rights to organise and collective bargaining which are embodied in Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 135 and 141,

Recognising the responsibility of governments in the field of development policy and considering that decisions concerning development plans and programmes should involve consultation with employers' and workers' representatives as well as their active participation, since the sound functioning of tripartism is the best guarantee for the success and effectiveness of these plans and programmes;

1. Urges all member States of the International Labour Organisation:

(a) to formulate and apply, as a matter of priority, an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, so as to stimulate sustained economic growth and development, thus raising the standard of living of the population;

(b) to adopt a policy of incentives for job-creative economic activities, this policy being based on national development criteria and in line with national policies; to develop employment and vocational guidance services so as to facilitate access to the labour market;

(c) to continue and intensify efforts to devise coherent training systems and policies;

(d) to develop, as a matter of priority, programmes for the social protection and initial employment of young people and for the reintegration in the labour market of the long-term unemployed and of workers who have interrupted their working life, to assume family responsibilities, for example, and to provide for retraining or further training under these programmes; to provide also the means of access to new skilled employment in the case of the restructuring or reconversion of certain sectors of the economy;

(e) to increase economic cooperation between countries which are at different stages of economic development as well as the regional level;

(f) to promote long-term development of world trade, based on equitable and mutually advantageous terms of trade;

(g) to provide migrant workers with equal opportunity and treatment and, at the same time, prevent the "brain drain" which deprives countries of skills that are crucially important for their development;

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to:

(a) encourage member States to increase employment substantially, in both quantitative and qualitative terms, and to take the necessary economic and social policy measures at the national and international levels and, for this purpose, to advise member States on the means of achieving their objectives as regards employment and the meeting of basic needs;

(b) update the World Employment Programme, taking particular account of the process of structural adjustment, the transition to a market economy and the introduction of new technologies, and to submit a draft update of the Programme to a future session of the Conference;

(c) continue and strengthen training activities at the national and regional levels, ensuring the optimum distribution and enhanced effectiveness of these programmes;

(d) cooperate fully with other organisations of the United Nations system in the search for solutions to the problems of employment and the meeting of basic needs.

Resolution concerning the contribution of enterprise development to the creation of full, productive and freely chosen employment, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Ms. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada; Ms. de Vits, Workers' delegate, Belgium; Ms. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstrom, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen-Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Lettieri, Workers' delegate, Italy; Mr. Mendoza, Workers' delegate, Philippines; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the obligation of the ILO to further programmes which will achieve, inter alia, full employment, rising standards of living, a just share of the fruits of progress to all, the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the cooperation of management and labour in the continuous improvement of productive efficiency, the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures, and the assurance of equality of educational and vocational opportunity,

Emphasising the particular relevance of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169),

Recalling further the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, held in November 1987,

Considering that the worldwide crisis of structural change has left hundreds of millions of people enemployed or underemployed, with a consequent rise in poverty and particularly adverse effects on women,

Recognising the potential contribution of enterprise development to the creation of full, productive, and freely chosen employment and the need to ensure that innovation and technological change have a positive net effect on employment and working conditions,

Noting that successful structural adjustment must entail optimal use of resources and result in continuously rising standards of living for the whole of the population,

Emphasising therefore the need to support measures of structural change that fully address all social aspects, that provide a realistic strategy for sustainable development and employment creation, and that have been elaborated with the full involvement of employers' and workers' organisations, which is vital if adjustment is to succeed in stimulating the capacity of enterprises to create full, productive, freely chosen, secure and adequately remunerated employment, which will also advance social justice,

Aware that environmental considerations will have increasingly significant implications for employment policy in the coming years,

Underlining the responsibility of governments to take measures to ensure in practice the respect of all ratified ILO instruments,

Convinced that governments need to take measures to provide the appropriate infrastructure and a framework for active labour market policies if the private sector is to flourish,

Considering therefore the need for governments to create the appropriate environment to stimulate employment growth, entailing measures to raise public confidence in the prospects for sustainable economic growth, increase investment, promote free collective bargaining and maximise the potential of arrangements for tripartite consultation;

1. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to promote economic and employment policies, adopted through full consultation with employers' and workers' organisations, that encourage enterprise development so that self-sustaining new jobs in conformity with ILO standards are created, requiring inter alia vigorous measures of public investment, effective industrial policies, the promotion of collective bargaining and constructive industrial relations systems:

(b) to encourage this process through active labour market policies including high-quality training and retraining programmes and better employment services:

(c) to devote particular attention to employment generation for the most marginalised sections in society, including women and rural sector workers.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to give special emphasis, when implementing the programme of the ILO and when planning future activities, to:

(i) the development of research and study activities and assistance to employers' and workers' organisations with the goal of promoting policies of economic and environmental adaptation which can most successfully achieve structural change to improve living standards and working conditions while protecting vulnerable groups;

(ii) activities to promote the development of appropriate national economic and employment policies that would enhance the potential of enterprises in the creation of full, productive, freely chosen, secure and adequately remunerated employment;

(b) to promote and organise exchanges of experience among countries adopting as essential elements of their economic and employment policies the promotion of enterprise development, negotiations between employers' and workers' organisations on structural change in the labour market and the promotion of sound industrial relations based on freedom of association and free collective bargaining, and the full incorporation of adequate social considerations into economic programmes, in order to increase opportunities for sustainable and productive employment.

Resolution concerning the protection and promotion of the rights of migrants workers, submitted by Ms. Aerenlund, Workers' delegate, Denmark; Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Ms. Buverud Pedersen, Workers' delegate, Norway; Ms. Carr, Workers' delegate, Canada; Ms. De Vits, Workers' delegate, Belgium; Ms. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Mr. Edstrom, Workers' delegate, Sweden; Ms. Engelen-Kefer, Workers' delegate, Germany; Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands; Mr. Gray, Workers' delegate, United States; Mr. Lettieri, Workers' delegate, Italy; Mr. Mendoza, Workers' delegate, Philippines; Mr. Mugalla, Workers' delegate, Kenya; Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico; Mr. Tanaka, Workers' delegate, Japan; and Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland

The General conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Guided by the recognition in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution of the urgent need to protect the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own,

Recognising that migrant workers are particularly vulnerable, and in need of specific measures for the protection of their basic rights,

Deploring the racism and xenophobia to which migrant workers are often exposed,

Noting the protection guaranteed by the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and by the accompanying Recommendations,

Endorsing the resolution on migrant workers in Asia adopted by the 11th Asian Regional Conference of the ILO (Bangkok, 26 November-2 December 1991), Considering that migrants make a positive contribution to the development of the countries in which they work, but that migration for employment is often undertaken as a result of poor economic and social conditions and inadequate job opportunities in the sending countries,

Underlining, therefore, the importance of the terms of the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), which calls on Members to create more employment opportunities and better conditions of work in countries of emigration so as to reduce the need to migrate to find employment, and to ensure that international migration takes place under conditions designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment,

Regretting that migration systems in some regions embody practices that are not in keeping with international labour standards, and considering that there is urgent need to bring the recruitment and employment of migrants into conformity with those standards,

Recognising the continuing responsibility of the ILO to take a leading role in international efforts to promote the welfare of migrant workers and their families displaced by the Gulf conflict, and to promote respect of their acquired rights;

1. Invites governments and, where appropriate, employers' and workers' organisations:

(a) to take all necessary measures to ensure that the terms and conditions of employment of migrant workers respect the principles of freedom of association and non-discrimination, and the provisions of relevant ILO instruments;

(b) to ratify and implement fully ILO Conventions Nos. 97, 118, 143 and 157, and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families;

(c) to pursue actively the objectives of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), and to cooperate in the effective provision of targeted international assistance, designed to alleviate migrationary pressures;

(d) to formulate and apply strictly laws and regulations to combat all forms of racism and xenophobia, and to intensify educational activities in this field.

2. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to make due provision in his programme and budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium for increased activities for the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers, and to allocate for that purpose resources on a scale commensurate with the issues to be confronted;

(b) to present to an early session of the Governing Body specific proposals to enable its Committee on Discrimination to examine on a regular basis the conditions of migrant workers, and to make recommendations for action when these are not in conformity with international labour standards;

(c) to convene at an early date a tripartite advisory meeting, bringing together government, employer and worker representatives from migrant sending and receiving countries, as well as representatives of appropriate international organisations, to provide guidance on future ILO policy and activities in the field of migration;

(d) to increase the provision of advisory services, monitoring and technical cooperation on migration issues, with the particular objective of promoting the administrative capacity of national authorities to apply effectively regulations for the protection of the rights of migrant workers;

(e) to liaise closely with other United Nations agencies and regional inter-governmental organisations on all matters affecting migrant workers' rights;

(f) to cooperate closely with the United Nations Compensation Commission so as to ensure that the extensive work already done by the ILO to register migrant workers displaced by the Gulf conflict is put to use in ensuring that proper compensation reaches the largest possible number of those with just entitlements.

Resolution concerning the future role of the ILO with respect to the situation of migrant workers and their families and the causes of migratory flows, submitted by Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Guided by the objectives of the Organisation, in particular the Preamble to the Constitution,

In full accordance with the long-standing activities conducted by the Organisation to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in its standard-setting as well as in its technical cooperation activities,

Recalling that protection measures are guaranteed in the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), and the Maintenance of Social Security Rights Convention, 1982 (No. 157), and in the accompanying Recommendations,

Recalling also the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1990 (resolution 45/158) of the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, to which the ILO made a positive contribution,

Emphasing that migratory flows are not a new phenomenon and that the contribution of migrant workers has frequently been beneficial for the development of receiving countries, while the integration of immigrants has often been difficult,

Observing that, as this century nears its end, the lot of migrant workers and the pressure to emigrate point to a deep-rooted economic and social malaise throughout the world, caused by major imbalances between the various regions of the world,

Believing that three major factors should be taken into consideration, namely:

(a) the extremely disturbing social and economic situation of the majority of developing countries and demographic trends in the South, as well as the complex transition taking place in Central and Eastern Europe, which give rise to major migratory pressures;

(b) the difficulties facing the industrialised countries – unemployment, precarious employment and marginalisation – which are a source of increasing tension, in particular the rise of the extreme Right and racism;

(c) the fact that much still remains to be done, even in countries with democratic regimes, to achieve equality of treatment and the participation at all levels of society of immigrants who have regular status – which are prerequisites for any integration policy;

Considering that restrictions on immigration, more or less strictly applied by the industrialised countries, are increasingly circumvented by the illegal recruitment of foreign labour and by the increase in the number of asylum-seekers,

Noting that the absence of appropriate measures is likely to result in violent manifestations of intolerance and undermine the democratic process, constitute a threat to peace and reduce economic efficiency,

Noting with satisfaction the efforts made by the Office of the Director-General of the ILO and by the departments and the regional offices concerned (whether during the Gulf War, in the Mediterranean, Asian, African or European regions or in the context of recent initiatives taken jointly with the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees), and that, despite its meagre resources, the ILO has been able to contribute to finding short-term solutions or to developing policies which are more favourable to migrant workers,

Reaffirming that all the constituents of the ILO are obliged, by virtue of the Constitution of the Organisation and the Declaration of Philadelphia, to ensure respect for, and promote, fundamental social rights, above all so that no human being suffers discrimination on ground of race, sex, origin, age, social, status, culture, religion or ideology,

Expressing the wish that this commitment will result in the ratification and applciation of the above-mentioned Conventions and Recommendations of the Organisation and of the United Nations Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families,

Stressing that the information given and the methods advocated in the relevant ILO instruments should be adapted to reality through collective agreements and enterprise agreements or by appropriate administrative and legislative measures,

Emphasising that it is important to establish policies and programmes to combat marginalisation and poverty as well as to promote equality of treatment in the fields of education, housing, employment, remuneration, social infrastructure, training, conditions of work and social protection, in the interest of both national and foreign workers as well of as their families,

Demanding that effective means be used against the suppliers, intermediaries and users of clandestine labour,

Advocating the launching of a campaign to promote the application to migrant workers of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95),

Calling for significant changes in development aid poilicies so as to include in them measures for employment promotion, human resources development and the improvement of the conditions of life and work of populations,

Convinced that it is only by measures of this kind, taken by governments and employers' and workers' organisations, that it will be possible progressively to reduce migratory pressures;

1. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to intensify the capacity of the Office so that it may guide, stimulate and coordinate combined or individual efforts of the Organisation's constituents to face these serious problems;

(b) to continue operational dialogue with the Bretton Woods institutions (IMF, world Bank), the specialised agencies of the United Nations and regional organisations (EC, OAU, OAS, ASEAN, OECD, etc.) so as to promote economic recovery, which would have positive social effects, particularly for the most underprivileged populations, to bring about changes in development policies and international relations in the economic, financial, commercial, cultural or technical spheres in order to reduce economic and social imbalances, and to promote the application of practical measures which would ensure the gradual achievement of equality of opportunity and treatment, as well as objective conditions of freedom and dignity;

(c) to organise with the Director-General of the ILO the monitoring of these policies at regular intervals, and in particular to arrange for the Conference to examine, at its session in 1996, the measures taken by member States to promote and apply the above-mentioned ILO instruments.

2. Invites member States, in the light of the serious implications of the situation, which can only be controlled in a democratic manner by coherent international social policies, to provide the Organisation with adequate financial and human resources, so as to put an end to a situation which for at least a decade has been seriously weakening the Organisation and thus gradually rendering it incapable of fulfilling its mandate.

Resolution concerning the development of democracy, the internationalisation of the economy and the promotion of tripartism, submitted by Mr. Willy Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the declaration of Philadelphia affirms that "freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress" and that "the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare".

Recalling also that to attain these objectives, the Declaration underlines the obligation of the ILO to implement programmes which will achieve "the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the cooperation of management and labour in the continuous improvement of productive efficiency, and the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures",

Considering that several countries, on all continents, have set in motion or strengthened processes of democratisation,

Hoping that these processes will succeed, as they are vital to economic and social efficiency and to the material, spiritual and cultural development of citizens,

Observing that the role of the social partners and tripartite institutions is crucial in these developments and that labour relations of a high calibre must make it possible for the social and economic partners to play an effective role in the democratisation of economic and social life, particularly in public administration, in private enterprises and in all spheres of working and social life,

Noting that the internationalisation of the economy, the creation of supranational entities (such as groupings of States and the creation of integrated economic areas) and the internationalisation of enterprises give rise to major changes in economic, technical and social strategies and measures,

Concerned by the fact that the process of privatisation and opening up of markets in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe entails the marginalisation of the social partners and of the principles of tripartism and fosters unbridled deregulation,

Observing that these developments have implications not only for the level, nature, content and effects of collective bargaining, but also for the full effectiveness of national social and labour legislation and on the efficiency of certain tripartite institutions,

Considering that these developments also affect the degree of mutual influence, in terms of knowledge and of power, of the tripartite (workers, employers, authorities) and bipartite social partners:

1. Calls on all the constituents of the ILO to place Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 135, 141, 144 and 151 and the accompanying Recommendations at the centre of the economic and social policies of all countries and of regional and international governmental institutions.

2. Calls on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

(a) to establish an ad hoc committee to examine and evaluate the activities of the ILO, with an eye to fostering a tripartism that is vibrant, relevant, credible and adapted to the various and complex situations that exist;

(b) to instruct this committee to examine:

  (i) developments since the reforms that have been introduced in Central and Eastern Europe;

  (ii) structural adjustment policies in the various continents, and particularly the organisation and representation of groups or activities in the informal sector;

  (iii) the effects of the internationalisation of the economy, the internationalisation of numerous economic and financial operators and the creation of supranational entities;

  (iv) the ways and means of promoting tripartism as well as bipartism through all ILO activities, especially technical cooperation;

  (v) the strengthening of the human and financial resources required for the Organisation to assume these crucial tasks;

(c) to arrange for this committee to meet as soon as possible and report to the Conference at an early session.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to strengthen the services of the ILO which are able to support economic and social democratisation;

(b) to take such measures as to ensure that the ILO and its constituents are not excluded from international or supranational structures, so as to prevent tripartite bodies or national bipartite relations, in practice, from being gradually stripped of their functions and becoming third-rate administrative institutions or empty structures.

Resolution concerning ILO action against social marginalisation, for the promotion of employment and equality of opportunity and treatment and for the development of human resources, submitted by Mr. Peirens, Workers' delegate, Belgium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that the Declaration of Philadelphia affirms that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to propserity everywhere" and that "the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussion and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare".

Recalling also that "lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice" and that "it is a responsibility of the International Labour Organisation to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective",

Observing with concern that poverty and precariousness now widely characterise the lives of entire populations in much of the developing world,

Observing that the transition to a market economy in the countries of Eastern and Central Europe entails a long and complex process of adjustment, whose social implications are extremely serious for the majority of the populations,

Noting that economic and technical developments and social measures in industrialised countries have undermined social progress and brought about persisting situations of precariousness and marginalisation, Noting with concern that these inequalities in employment, income, living conditions, training, social protection, etc., are frequently related to age, sex, race and national or social origin,

Concerned by the fact that these situations give rise to dangerous trends which can impair economic efficiency, the effective exercise of fundamental social rights (and therefore human rights) and the development of democratic practices,

Observing that many signs point to the same conclusion – that antagonisms between peoples and groups are aggravated by these inequalities, are expressed in a violent manner and therefore constitute a threat to peace,

Emphasising also that the 48th Session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission adopted by consensus a resolution concerning human rights and extreme poverty;

1. Urges the member States of the ILO:

(a) to ratify and implement Conventions Nos. 111, 122, 142 and the accompanying Recommendations;

(b) to adopt and ensure the application of laws and regulations that are in conformity with these Conventions, with a view to eliminating social marginalisation and promoting employment, equality of opportunity and the development of human resources.

2. Calls on all the constituents of the ILO (governments, employers and workers) to initiate specific and coordinated action to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for all men and women and to combat precariousness of living conditions and social marginalisation.

3. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to strengthen the ILO's action so as to encourage and help governments to apply the ILO standards concerning social and fundamental rights, in particular Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 111, 122, 138 and 142;

(b) to propose to the constituents of the ILO ways and means of drawing up legislation and agreements and establishing programmes to promote employment, to facilitate entry into working life and social integration, and to combat the precariousness of living conditions and social marginalisation;

(c) to prepare and distribute widely, for the use of governments, employers and trade union organisations, readily understandable information which is based on the standards and policies of the ILO concerning discrimination in access to vocational training, to employment, to the various occupations and to conditions of employment;

(d) to provide practical guidelines, teaching material and information on matters related to entry into working life and social integration and to the fight against the precariousness of living conditions and social marginalisation;

(e) to propose as soon as possible a world campaign for the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment for all men and women and for human resources development, so as to slow down and impede the progression of separate development.

Standing Orders questions

Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 79th Session

AMENDMENTS TO THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. The Governing Body has referred to the Conference a number of proposed amendments to the Conference Standing Orders in relation to two separate issues. The Governing Body had taken decisions on the substance of the two reforms, on the recommendation of its Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference at its 251st Session (November 1991), and approved the drafting of the amendments required to implement them through the Standing Orders, on the recommendation of its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, at its 252nd Session (February-March 1992). The first of these reforms relates to the shortening of the time-limit for speeches in the plenary and the second concerns suppression of the Selection Committee in the initial constitution of Conference Committees.

A. Shortening of the time-limit for speeches in plenary sittings

2. The Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations agreed with the text proposed by the Office reducing the time-limit in article 14, paragraph 6, from 15 to ten minutes.

3. The Governing Body therefore submits to the Conference, for adoption, an amendment to article 14, paragraph 6, of its Standing Orders which would replace the words "15 minutes" by the words "ten minutes".

B. Constitution of Conference Committees

4. The Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations considered a number of proposals by the Office to implement, through the Standing Orders, the rationalisation agreed to by the Governing Body on the recommendation of the Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference, according to which committees should be directly appointed by the Conference at the beginning of its work, without the intervention of the Selection Committee, so as to save at least half a day. The basic idea is that the groups would meet officially even before the formal opening of the Conference to elect their Officers, choose their candidates for each of the three posts of Vice-President and prepare their proposals regarding the setting up and composition of committees. After the election of the President, the plenary could then immediately deal with the question of the setting up and composition of committees. The proposals made by the groups would be endorsed by the Conference and the committees thereby constituted could meet as soon as possible thereafter in order to begin their work. The Selection Committee itself would be set up at the same time as the other committees and could therefore examine from then on any suggestions concerning the composition of committees, as well as any other questions normally falling within its terms of reference, including its standard business at the beginning of the Conference.

5. The Committee agreed with an amendment to the Office proposal designed to streamline further revised article 25 (by avoiding an obligatory break in the proceedings after the election of the President) and agreed that, so far as consequential amendments were concerned, article 9 should be adapted to the proposed reform rather than disposed of altogether. The Employer members insisted that the Standing Orders be applied in such a way that the Credentials Committee be established as early as possible after the formal opening of the Conference so that objections and questions of quorum could be dealt with as soon as they arose. The Employer and Worker members also recorded their position that, since the meetings of the groups which might henceforth take place before the formal opening of the Conference were to be official meetings, the expenses incurred by the non-governmental delegates and advisers in attending such meetings as part of the Conference should be borne by the governments in accordance with article 13, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

6. The Governing Body therefore submits to the Conference, for adoption, the following proposed amendments to articles 4, 9, 25, 72 and 75 of the Conference Standing Orders[1]:

Article 4, paragraph 2

It shall be the duty of the Selection Committee to arrange the programme of the Conference, to fix the time and agenda for the plenary sittings, [to make proposals relating to the setting up and composition of other committees,) and to report to the Conference on any other questions requiring a decision for the proper conduct of its business, in accordance with the Conference Standing Orders. Where appropriate, the Committee may delegate any of these functions to its Officers.

Article 9

[Procedure for the appointment of committees]

Adjustments to the membership of committees

The following rules shall apply to all committees appointed by the Conference with the exception of the Selection Committee, the Credentials Committee, the Finance Committee of Government Representatives and the Drafting Committee:

(a) [when it has been decided to appoint a committee to which these rules apply, the Selection Committee shall fix the size of such committee and shall ask each group to furnish a list setting out in order of preference a larger number of names than there are places allocated to the group on the committee;] once the various committees have been established and their initial membership appointed by the Conference, it shall be for the Selection Committee to propose to the Conference, for its approval, subsequent changes in the composition of such committees;

[(b) the Selection Committee shall examine the lists furnished by the three groups and, if it appears desirable that any adjustment should be made in the composition of the committee so as to secure representation more adequate for the subject with which the committee will deal or more satisfactory as regards the allocation of seats to the various nationalities, shall endeavour to secure such adjustment, subject to the approval of the representatives of the groups who are present;]

[(c) the lists agreed upon by the Selection Committee shall be reported to the Conference for its approval;]

(b) [(d)] if a delegate has not been nominated by his group to sit on any committee, he may bring the matter to the notice of the Selection Committee which shall have power to place him on one or more committees, enlarging the number of members of such committee or committees accordingly. Any such request shall be made to the Chairman of the Selection Committee [at the latest at the sitting following that at which it fixed the composition of the committee or committees in question];

(c) [(e)] in accordance with article 18 of the Constitution of the Organisation, the Conference may add to any committee to which these rules apply technical experts who shall have the right to take part in the discussions but not to vote.

Article 25

1. The Conference shall be opened by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, assisted by the other Officers of the Governing Body. These provisional Officers shall continue to act until the President of the Conference has assumed office.

2. In his opening address, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall present the report of the Governing Body on its work.

3. The first business of the Conference shall be the election of the President. The Conference shall then receive the nominations made by the groups and shall proceed to elect the three Vice-Presidents and to set up the various committees and appoint their members on the basis of proposals from the groups.

[4. The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups shall then meet separately to elect their own Officers and to decide on their nominations for the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference and for the members of the Selection Committee.]

4. [5.] (1) In order to facilitate the choice of Officers of the Conference who are all of different nationalities as required by article 3, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, the three groups share priority of nomination for the designation of Vice-Presidents of the Conference in the rotation indicated in the following table:

(2) If a group nominates a Vice-President of the same nationality as the Vice-President nominated by a group possessing priority of nomination, such nomination shall be void.

5. [6.] In accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, the Government group shall nominate twenty-eight members for the Selection Committee and the Employers' and Workers' groups shall each nominate fourteen members. In none of these groups shall any Member of the Organisation have more than one member.

[7. The Conference shall then meet again in plenary sitting to receive the nominations made by the groups and shall proceed to elect the three Vice-Presidents and to appoint the Selection Committee.]

[8. The Selection Committee shall then meet and, after electing its Officers, shall proceed to frame proposals for the number of committees to be appointed by the Conference and their composition.]

[9. The proposals made by the Committee shall be submitted to the Conference for approval.]

[10. The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups shall then meet to make their nominations for the membership of committees in accordance with the provisions of article 9.]

Article 72, paragraph 1 (Correction of the English text only)

Each group shall hold official meetings for the transaction of the following business, in accordance with the Conference Standing Orders: ...

Article 72, paragraph 2

At the first official meeting of each group, [which shall be held as soon as possible after the Conference meets,] a representative of the Secretariat shall be present, if the group so desires, to inform the group as to procedure.

Article 75, paragraph 2

[As soon as the Selection Committee has come to a decision as to the number of committees to be set up,] At the first official meeting of the group, the delegates of each government shall inform the Secretary of the group, in writing, upon which committees their government desires representation and in what order of preference.

Report submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference for the year 1991-92

1. The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14(1) of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last (June 1991) session of the Conference, i.e. the post-Conference sittings of the Governing Body's 250th Session in June 1991 and its 251st and 252nd Sessions (November 1991 and February-March 1992), but not the pre-Conference sittings of its 253rd Session (May-June 1992). An account of those sittings will be given to the Conference by the Chairman of the Governing Body when he introduces the present report. The information provided below is a summarized account of the work of the Governing Body, stressing the more important decisions. More detailed information can be found in the minutes and documents relating to the different sessions.

A. MATTERS RELATING TO THE GOVERNING BODY

2. At its resumed 250th Session the Governing Body elected its Officers for 1991-92 as follows: Chairman: Mr. Y. Chotard (France); Employer Vice-Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Oechslin (France); Worker Vice-Chairman: Mr. J. Morton (United Kingdom). Following the retirement of Mr. Morton, at its 252nd Session the Governing Body elected as its Worker Vice-Chairperson Ms. S. Carr (Canada).

3. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of a number of changes in its composition and that of its committees and various bodies.

B. MATTERS RELATING TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. Date, place and agenda of the 80th (1993) Session of the Conference

4. At its 251st Session, the Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 80th (1993) Session of the Conference. the Governing Body decided that it should open on Wednesday, 2 June 1993 and that the session should be held in Geneva.

5. The Governing Body decided to place two new technical items on the 1993 Conference agenda, one being for general discussion. It noted that, as a result of this decision and having regard to the standing items which the Conference would have before it and the item likely to be carried forward for second discussion from the present session, the agenda of the 80th (1993) Session would be as follows:

Standing items

- Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.
- Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions.
- Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Items placed on the agenda by the Conference or the Governing Body

- Prevention of industrial disasters (second discussion).
- Part-time work (first discussion).
- The role of the ILO in technical cooperation (general discussion).

6. The Governing Body also noted that the Conference would, in addition, have before it a special report on the application of the updated Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the Programme of Action Against Apartheid.

2. Action on the resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 78th (1991) Session

7. At its 78th (1991) Session, the Conference adopted resolutions calling for action by the Governing Body on the following subjects: the application of modern agricultural technology; structural adjustment, industrial relations, and economic and social development; and ILO action for women workers. At its 251st Session the Governing Body took note of the information provided by the Office concerning ongoing and planned action in these fields, and requested the Director-General to take appropriate measures to give effect to the requests made in the resolutions.

C. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

1. Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Forms for reports (article 22 of the Constitution) on the application of ratified Conventions

8. At its 251st Session the Governing Body approved the report forms for the Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1970 (No. 133), and the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172).

Forms for reports (article 19 of the Constitution) on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

9. At its 251st Session the Governing Body approved the report form for the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and Recommendation (No. 165).

10. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body approved the report forms for the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Choice of Conventions and Recommendations on which reports should be requested under article 19 of the Constitution

11. At its 251st Session the Governing Body decided to choose the following instruments on which governments would be requested to supply reports under article 19, paragraphs 5(e), 6(d) and 7(b) of the Constitution:

in 1993: the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), to be examined by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1994; in 1994: the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and Recommendation (No. 166), to be examined by the Committee of Experts in 1995.

2. Freedom of association

Special procedures

12. At its 251st and 252nd Sessions the Governing Body examined four reports submitted to it by its Committee on Freedom of Association, adopting definitive and interim conclusions in 64 cases.

13. In the introductions to its reports, the Committee on Freedom of Association drew particular attention to a number of cases in which the governments concerned had sent no replies, despite the time that had elapsed since the complaints had been submitted and the seriousness of the allegations made by the complainants. In some of these cases, concerning El Salvador, Haiti and Sierra Leone, the Committee finally had to examine the complaints, in accordance with its rules of procedure, in the absence of any substantial reply from the Government. Here the Committee stressed the importance of a prompt, detailed and full reply from the governments concerned by cases, as this was in their interest, for in any event once a certain amount of time had passed the Committee examined cases even in the absence of a government reply.

14. In addition to the cases it examined, the Committee on Freedom of Association at the Governing Body's 251st and 252nd Sessions studied 24 cases in which the governments concerned had kept it informed of the effect they had given to its recommendations. This procedure is of particular interest, as it enables the Committee on Freedom of Association to assess its activities and to note that, in many cases, the matters it has dealt with have shown positive developments. Thus, the Committee noted with satisfaction the final resolution of a labour dispute through fruitful negotiations between a miners' union and an enterprise in the United States, and the adoption of regulations governing the conditions for staff evaluations and working conditions in the public service in Cyprus. It also noted with interest the annulment by decision of a constitutional court in Ecuador of a decree prohiting any one workers' representative from participating more than once in sessions of the International Labour Conference, the reinstatement of teachers dismissed following a strike in the Philippines, and the release of a trade union official imprisoned for several years in Bahrein.

15. At its resumed 250th Session the Governing Body referred to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Committion on Freedom of Association the complaint presented in May 1988 by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) against the Government of South Africa, alleging various infringements of the exercise of freedom of association in that country, in accordance with the procedure in force concerning complaints submitted against the governments of States that are Members of the United Nations but not of the International Labour Organisation. The Commission held two meetings, in Geneva in October 1991 to determine the procedure to be followed, and in South Africa in February 1992 to conduct hearings with representatives of the parties concerned and with witnesses.

Constitutional procedures concerning freedom of association

Representation made under article 24 of the Constitution

16. At its 251st and 252nd Sessions, the Governing Body approved a report of its Committee on Freedom of Association concerning a representation made by the General Confederation of Norwegian Trade Unions (LO) under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO, concerning the non-observance by Turkey of the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), as well as several other complaints submitted by various international trade union organizations alleging violations of freedom of association in Turkey (Cases Nos. 997, 999 and 1029).

3. Special constitutional procedures

Representations made under article 24 of the Constitution

17. At its resumed 250th Session, the Governing Body approved the final report of the Committee set up to consider the representation made by the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, alleging non-observance by Iraq of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118). The Governing Body declared closed the procedure initiated under this representation.

18. At its resumed 250th Session, the Governing Body decided that a representation made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO, alleging non-observance by Yugoslavia of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), was receivable and set up a tripartite Committee of three of its members to examine it.

19. At its 251st Session the Governing Body decided that the representations made under article 24 of the Constitution by the Trade Union Association of Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia and by the Czech and Slovak Confederation of Trade Unions (CZ-KOS) alleging non-observance by the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) were receivable, and set up a tripartite committee to examine them. At its 252nd Session it approved the report of this Committee and declared the procedure closed.

20. At its 251st Session the Governing Body declared closed the procedure concerning the representation made under article 24 of the Constitution by the Federation of Egyptian Trade Unions alleging the non-observance by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

21. At its 251st Session the Governing Body decided that a representation made by the International Organization of Employers (IOE) and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS) under article 24 of the ILO Constitution, alleging non-observance by Venezuela of international labour Conventions Nos. 4, 81, 87, 88, 95, 98, 100, 111, 143, 144 and 158 was receivable and set up a tripartite committee of three of its members to examine the aspects concerning Conventions Nos. 4, 81, 88, 95, 100, 111, 143, 144, 158 and entrusted the examination of the aspects concerning Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 to its Committee on Freedom of Association.

Complaints submitted under article 26 of the Constitution

22. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body decided to postpone consideration of a complaint by the Employers' delegate of Sweden to the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference against the Government of Sweden, alleging that it had failed to apply satisfactorily the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147).

4. International labour standards and technical cooperation

23. The Governing Body also held an extensive discussion on the links between technical cooperation and international labour standards, on the basis of a paper submitted by the Director-General. There was wide agreement that these two principal activities of the ILO should be more closely coordinated and should reinforce each other, on the basis of a relationship of partnership between the ILO and its member States.

D. Discrimination

24. At its 251st Session, in considering the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid, the Governing Body discussed matters relating to operational activities and the effect given to the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid adopted at the 78th (1991) Session of the Conference. It also considered the report of the seventh meeting of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other action against apartheid. The Governing Body decided to convene a Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa in Harare (Zimbabwe) in May 1992 to discuss regional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa and recent developments in South Africa. The Governing Body also considered ILO action on discrimination in employment and occupation, including the ratification and application of Conventions, the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, and ILO action for equality of opportunity and treatment of men and women in employment.

25. Following the submission by Arab members of the Governing Body in November 1991 of a draft resolution proposing that the Governing Body propose to the Conference either the holding of a special sitting of the Conference for the consideration of the Director-General's annual report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories or for the setting up of a Conference committee to consider it, the Governing Body decided at its 252nd Session in favour of the proposal for the holding of a special sitting at the present session of the International Labour Conference, and invited the Director-General to submit proposals to the Selection Committee of the Conference – if the conditions set out in paragraph 5 of the Office paper were met – for the holding of a special sitting at the 79th Session of the Conference for the consideration of his report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, based on the arrangements worked out at the 77th and adjusted at the 78th Session of the Conference, subject to any further changes or additions that might be made thereto in the light of the Governing Body's discussion.

E. Standing Orders questions

26. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body proposed two sets of draft amendments to the Conference Standing Orders for adoption by the Conference. Both amendments followed from decisions taken by the Governing Body at its 251st Session on the basis of recommendations made by the Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference. The first related to the shortening of speeches in plenary sitting and the second concerned the suppression of the intervention of the Selection Committee in the initial constitution of Conference committees.

27. At the same session the Governing Body noted that the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had examined and endorsed the proposed restatement of the mandate and methods of work of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers (CEART).

F. WORKING PARTY ON IMPROVEMENTS IN THE FUNCTIONING OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

28. At its 251st Session the Governing Body considered the report of the first meeting of the Working Party that it had established at its 250th Session to consider the functioning of the International Labour Conference. It reached agreement on a number of simplifications in the procedures of the Conference, in particular as regards the role and functioning of the Selection Committee.

29. The Governing Body agreed that the opening phase of the Conference could be substantially shortened if the Conference were to appoint the committees directly on the basis of the groups' proposals rather than wait for those proposals to be approved by the Selection Committee. It also supported the idea that the Selection Committee could systematically delegate to its Officers, from the first sitting of the Conference, the functions assigned to it regarding in particular the programme of the Conference. Pending the introduction of the amendments to the Standing Orders necessary to enable the Conference to approve directly the establishment and initial composition of committees, interim measures could be adopted at the present session of the Conference to achieve substantially the same result. The Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations was requested to consider the amendments in question as well as the amendments necessary to consolidate the shortening of speeches in plenary to ten minutes, which was applied on an experimental basis in 1991.

30. All these procedural changes have been drawn to the attention of member States in the letter of convocation issued by the Director-General relating to the 1992 Conference, including the decision that the Conference will finish on Tuesday, 23 June.

31. The Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference met again during the Governing Body's 252nd Session and held substantive discussions on reducing the workload and shortening the duration of the Conference, but could not complete its works on these issues in the time available. At that session, the Governing Body agreed that the Working Party should meet again in November 1992.

G. PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE MATTERS

1. Programme and financial matters

32. At its 251st and 252nd Sessions the Governing Body took note of the regular budget account and the position of the Working Capital Fund. At its 251st Session it noted that, as of 15 October 1991, 61 member States had paid their contributions in full for 1991, compared with 67 at the same date in 1990. Budgetary income to 15 October 1991 for the 1990-91 biennium totalled $299,077,023, whereas budgetary expenditure amounted to $275,596,738.

33. The overall budgetary results for 1990-91 were noted by the Governing Body at its 252nd Session, budgetary income of $344,196,929 exceeding budgetary expenditure of $333,128,667 by $11,068,262. At that same session, the Governing Body approved transfers between budget items amounting to $991,347. It also noted that, should circumstances so warrant, a proposal that an exception be made to the provisions of Article 18 of the Financial Regulations regarding the use of the cash surplus, would be put before the Governing Body at its 253rd Session.

34. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body also noted that, by 31 January 1992, 34,582,801 Swiss francs had been received in respect of 1992 regular budget contributions, representing 11 per cent of the contributions assessed on member States for that year, 19 member States having paid their contributions in full compared with 14 at the same date in 1991. At the same session the Governing Body also took note of the first report of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee's Working Party on the Working Capital Fund.

35. At its 251st Session the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to accept gifts in money or in kind, made by governments, governmental and non-governmental organisations and private persons, at his discretion, provided that the gifts did not involve any financial liability for the Members of the Organisation and that details of such gifts were reported periodically to the Governing Body.

36. At the same session the Governing Body noted the report of the additional meeting of the Board of the International Training Centre of the ILO, Turin; endorsed the programme of, approved the 1992-93 budget for, and accepted contributions and gifts to the International Institute for Labour Studies; and approved the 1992-93 income and expenditure budgets for the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (CIS), the Inter-American Research and Documentation Centre on Vocational Training (CINTERFOR) and the Joint ILO/International Social Security Association Account (ILO/ISSA).

37. At its 251st and 252nd Sessions the Governing Body again took note of the ongoing consultations and negotiations with the UNDP concerning successor arrangements for support costs and related issues in respect of UNDP-financed technical cooperation activities, which had been brought to the attention of the Governing Body at its 246th, 248th, 249th and 250th Sessions. At its 252nd Session, the Governing Body noted the financial and staffing implications of the proposed new arrangements and also noted that the UNDP had issued a draft document incorporating the proposed new policy framework as well as operational guidelines for the new support cost arrangements, and that this document would be formalised after a period of testing and trial.

38. At its 251st Session, the Governing Body took note of the reports of the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit, including the report on its activities during the period 1 July 1990 to 30 June 1991. It also authorised the endowment of an ILO visiting lectureship on international social policy in honour of David A. Morse, former Director-General of the ILO, which will be financed out of interest accruing to the capital of the Nobel Peace Prize.

39. Also at its 251st Session, the Governing Body decided that the additional cost of convening a tripartite conference on southern Africa, estimated at $302,000, should be financed in the first instance by savings in Part I of the budget for 1992-93 or, failing that, be charged to Part II (Unforeseen Expenditure). It also authorised the holding of a tripartite symposium on new perspectives for tripartism in Europe, the cost thereof, estimated at $73,000, to be financed from the programme flexibility reserve.

40. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body engaged in preliminary consultations in connection with the Programme and Budget proposals for the 1994-95 biennium, discussing at length the initial ideas put forward by the Director-General regarding the major themes, priority areas for action and resource parameters. It also took note of two papers prepared by the Office relating to the Terminal Benefits Fund and the adjustment for staff turnover (lapse factor).

41. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body also decided to appoint a delegation to represent it at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, its cost to be financed from savings in Part I of the budget. While it was originally proposed that the delegation should be tripartite, the Government group decided not to appoint a Government member of the delegation.

42. At the same session the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference at its present session the adoption of resolutions relating to the draft scale of assessments for 1993, the rates of assessment of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania for 1991, 1992 and 1993, and the rate of assessment of the Republic of Korea for 1991 and 1992. These resolutions, together with the draft scale of assessments for 1993 are set out in the Annex to Report II.[1]

2. Administrative matters

43. At its 251st Session the Goverening Body examined the conclusions and recommendations of interest to the ILO contained in the 17th annual report of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC). These concerned the adjustment of the base/floor salary scale, the margin between remuneration in the United Nations and in the United States civil service, conditions of service of Assistant Secretaries-General and Under-Secretaries-General, pensionable remuneration of ungraded officials, the comprehensive review of pensionable remuneration for General Service staff including revised staff assessment rates, and a review of the functioning of the ICSC. The Governing Body endorsed the ICSC's recommendations on the base/floor salary scale and on the staff assessment rates for General Service staff, subject to their approval by the United Nations General Assembly, and authorized the Director-General to give effect to them in the ILO. At its 252nd Session, the Governing Body noted that the General Assembly had decided on a smaller increase in the base/floor salary than that recommended by the ICSC.

44. At its 251st Session the Governing Body considered the adjustment to the salary scale for General Service officials in Geneva which was due with effect from 1 January 1992. In order to avoid the additional administrative work and consequential costs of making retroactive payments, it authorised the Director-General to implement with effect from 1 January 1992 the revised salary scale and any revised rates of family allowances, to be established according to the ICSC methodology.

45. With regard to pension questions, at its 251st Session the Governing Body considered the issues discussed at the two previous sessions of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board (UNJSPB) held in February and July 1991. These included the following: pensionable remuneration of staff in the General Service category; pensionable remuneration of ungraded officials; the inclusion in article 54 of the Fund's regulations of a special reference to longevity and merit steps; longer-term modification of the pension adjustment system; actuarial valuation and investments of the Fund. It requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations to inform the General Assembly that the Governing Body endorsed the recommendations of the UNJSPB aimed at long-term modification of the pension adjustment system so as to ensure better protection against the erosion of the value of pensions in local currency.

46. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body was informed of the decisions taken by the United Nations General Assembly at its 46th Session in December 1991 in respect of pensionable remuneration of both General Service staff and ungraded officials, and of the pension adjustment system. The General Assembly adopted the resolutions contained in the reports of the UNJSPB and the ICSC in this respect. The Governing Body also took note of the report of the 98th Session of the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pension Fund, held in January 1992.

47. Regarding pensionable remuneration (PR), a comprehensive review of PR and pensions of General Service staff and other locally recruited categories had been undertaken jointly by the ICSC and the UNJSPB, which included alternative methodologies for determining the PR by (a) referring to the best local conditions of employment, (b) taking into account the income replacement rate, and (c) deriving the PR from net remuneration after the imposition of local taxes. The Governing Body was also informed of the current review of the methodology used to determine the PR and consequent pensions of ungraded officials, as recommended to the General Assembly by both the UNJSPB and the ICSC. The Governing Body noted with satisfaction the long-term modification of the pensions adjustment system that had been approved with effect from 1 April 1992; this involved changes in the four parameters used to determine the initial local currency pension under the arrangements introduced in 1981, and put an end to the transitional measure providing a floor amount, in force since 1 January 1991.

48. At its 251st Session the Governing Body took note of an exception to the Staff Regulations entailing additional expenditure of $40,222. It also noted amendments to the Staff Regulations approved by the Director-General under the authority delegated to him by the Governing Body. These included amendments to article 3.1.1, amendments to introduce an increased scale of pensionable remuneration for the Professional and higher categories and to specify that pensionable remuneration was determined directly by the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, and amendments to give effect to ICSC recommendations or to decisions of the United Nations General Assembly on the basis of ICSC recommendations concerning allowances payable to internationally recruited General Service staff, revised salary scale and consequential revision of allowances for General Service staff in Geneva, revised salary scales and rates of staff assessment for Professional and higher category staff, and an increase in the maximum amount payable for education grant or special education grant in certain currencies.

49. The Governing Body examined and took note at its 252nd Session of statistical information regularly submitted on the composition and structure of ILO staff.

H. Employment

50. Through its Committee on Employment the Governing Body again reviewed follow-up on the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment on the basis of a paper prepared by the Office. The Committee urged the ILO to exert greater influence on the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund in the field of structural adjustment, stressed the need for consultation with the social partners in country-level activities, and requested more information on the ILO's impact in country missions. The Committee also considered the report of the Tripartite Symposium on Structural Adjustment, Employment and Training in Latin America and the Caribbean, held in Caracas in August 1991.

51. The Committee examined an Office paper on ILO action on the informal sector prepared as follow-up on the discussion of the Director-General's Report to the Conference in 1991. A number of views were expressed on the role the ILO should play with respect to the informal sector. Following a wide-ranging discussion, the Committee agreed on a procedure whereby the Office could take the Governing Body's views into account in carrying out current activities and planning future work on the informal sector.

52. The Committee also held an extensive discussion on an Office paper concerning wages, non-wage labour costs and their relation to employment under conditions of structural adjustment. This followed a discussion of similar issues in 1990. Through this two-stage process the Committee was able to consider these controversial issues in detail and develop a range of practical policy proposals.

53. The Committee also held a brief discussion on an Office paper entitled "Social protection, safety nets and structural adjustment". As in the case of wage and non-wage labour costs, the Committee decided to deal with this issue in greater depth, and requested the Office to prepare a second discussion paper on this topic for November 1992.

I. Sectoral activities

54. At its 251st Session the Governing Body completed the programme of sectoral meetings for 1992-93 by deciding to include a tripartite meeting on the social effects of structural change in banking. It also decided on the title and mandate of the new Tripartite Technical Meeting which replaced the former Advisory Committee on Rural Development, to be known as the Tripartite Technical Meeting on Employment and Labour Conditions in the Rural Sector, and on the composition of the Tripartite Meeting on Social and Labour Issues in the Pulp and Paper Industry and of the Tripartite Meeting on Safety and Related Issues Pertaining to Work on Offshore Petroleum Installations, requesting the Director-General to submit a paper to a future meeting of the Industrial Activities Committee on the issues surrounding the selection of participants in meetings not covered by the Standing Orders for established or regular sectoral committees and meetings.

55. At the same session, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to distribute the texts adopted at the Second Session of the Forestry and Wood Industries Committee (April 1991) and those adopted at the Second Session of the Joint Committee for Postal and Telecommunications Services (May 1991). It also requested him to take the necessary action to give effect to the wishes expressed in those texts. It also decided on the composition of the First Session of the Standing Technical Committee for Health and Medical Services and took note of the periodic reports on the effect given to the requests of the 12th Session of the Metal Trades Committee (1988) and of the Ninth Session of the Committee on Work on Plantations (1989), as well as of a note on the participation of women in Industrial Committees and similar bodies, which will be developed further for subsequent discussion by the Industrial Activities Committee. Finally, it authorised the Director-General to invite a number of intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations to be represented by observers at sectoral meetings scheduled between November 1991 and May 1992.

56. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body considered the report of the 26th Session of the Joint Maritime Commission, held in Geneva in October 1991. It authorised distribution as required of the texts of the resolutions adopted by the Commission at that session, and requested the Director-General to take the necessary measures to give effect to them. These texts concerned the convening of a preparatory technical maritime conference and a maritime session of the International Labour Conference, changes in the shipboard environment and the characteristics of seafarers' employment, the revision of a number of international labour standards pertaining to the maritime sector, the international coordination of welfare activities and services for seafarers and their families, cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations agencies and maritime mobile offshore units.

J. MULTINATIONAL ENTERPRISES

57. At its 251st Session the Governing Body considered reports on the promotional and research activities undertaken by the Office, as well as a summary of information received from other international organisations dealing with different aspects of the activities of multinational enterprises (MNEs).

58. The Governing Body expressed satisfaction with the promotional activities carried out to date, and considered it essential to promote the Tripartite Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy in the countries of central and eastern Europe, particularly in view of ongoing efforts to attract foreign direct investment and to bring about a transition to a free market economy. It drew attention to the need to disseminate information on social and labour issues pertaining to the operations of enterprises in export processing zones (EPZs) worldwide. In this regard, it recalled that the 1992-93 programme and budget provided for the publication of a workers' education guide on the protection of workers' rights in MNEs, EPZs and joint ventures, and that the principles of the Tripartite Declaration were to be amply covered in this document.

59. The Governing Body considered the progress made in the study on the employment effects of MNEs, and noted with satisfaction the relatively high level of response to the survey carried out to collect information. After discussing the subjects to be covered in this publication, the Governing Body further recalled that the 1992-93 programme and budget provided for future research to be conducted on several subjects, including foreign direct investment in eastern Europe, mergers and acquisitions, MNEs in the service sector and export processing zones.

60. The Governing Body took note of a summary of information regarding the standard-setting, technical cooperation and research activities undertaken by six international institutions dealing with matters pertaining to MNEs.

K. RELATIONS WITH OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANISATIONS

61. At its 251st Session the Governing Body was informed of the ILO's contribution to preparations for the World Conference on Human Rights, which the General Assembly had decided to convene in 1993, and to the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, to be held in Rio de Janeiro in June 1992. It was also informed of the Conference on Labour Market and Social Policy Implications of Structural Change in Central and Eastern Europe, which the ILO had organised jointly with the OECD in Paris in September 1991.

62. The Governing Body considered the action of particular interest to the ILO taken by the Economic and Social Council in 1991, and considered the information contained in the report of the 13th Ordinary Session of the Intergovernmental Committee of the Rome Convention. The Governing Body also discussed the role of the ILO and of employers' and workers' organisations in international cooperation in matters related to nuclear safety, including the revision of the 1982 edition of the Basic Safety Standards for Radiation Protection and of the Manual on Radiation Protection in Hospitals and General Practice. It considered the Consensus Statements adopted by the WHO/ILO Consultations on Occupational Exposure of Health Care Workers to Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) and on AIDS and Seafarers. It also took note of the Annual Overview Report of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) for 1990.

63. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body was informed of the ILO's contribution to ongoing efforts to draft an international convention on nuclear safety. It was also informed of discussions between the ILO and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development concerning a relationship agreement between the two organisations.

64. At that session it considered a number of items which provided it with an opportunity to give guidance to the Office. It held a full discussion on the Office's contribution to the 1993 World Conference on Human Rights and discussed the entry into force of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, as well as the preliminary arrangements for the ILO's participation in supervising the application of the Convention. As regards the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, the Governing Body endorsed the ILO's continued participation in the preparations for the Conference, made arrangements for a delegation to represent it at the Conference, and requested the Office to consult the Officers of the Governing Body on the ILO's contribution. It also endorsed the initiatives for increased cooperation between the ILO and the UNEP in the 1992-93 biennium. Regarding the International Year for the World's Indigenous People (1993), the Governing Body endorsed the activities outlined in the Office paper with a view to promoting the ratification and implementation of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), and contributing to the International Year.

65. The Governing Body also considered an ILO/UNIDO Working Arrangement, which replaced the Memorandum of Understanding of 1976. It considered action of particular interest to the ILO taken by the United Nations General Assembly at its 46th Session, as well as in the Security Council and the United Nations secretariat. It also discussed the establishment of the new United Nations International Drug Control Programme (UNDCP) as the single body responsible for concerted international action for drug abuse control, and the role of the ILO in international cooperation in this area. The Governing Body examined a UNESCO proposal concerning the possible establishment of an International Centre for Technical and Vocational Training, and drew attention to the need for the ILO and UNESCO to cooperate closely in matters concerning education and training, requesting the Office to contact the organisers of the UNEVOC project in order to reach agreement on the modalities for cooperation with the ILO and its International Training Centre in Turin, in the spirit of the resolution adopted by the General Conference of UNESCO in October 1991, and in particular on the conditions for their participation in the UNEVOC Advisory Council.

L. TECHNICAL COOPERATION

66. At its 251st Session, through its Committee on Operational Programmes, the Governing Body carried out its annual comprehensive review of ILO operational activities during the previous year (1990). It also reviewed more recent developments within and outside the UN system which have substantial implications for ILO operational activities: in 1990, for the sixth consecutive year, technical cooperation registered a growth in annual expenditure: $152.2 million compared with $143.4 million in 1989, representing a 6.1 per cent increase. Africa remained the principal beneficiary, with annual expenditure in order of $80.5 million, a fact also explained by the large number of LDCs located in the region. As in the past, the bulk of expenditure occurred in the fields of employment promotion ($54.2 million), training ($41.7 million) and sectoral activities ($27 million). Significant increases were also registered in support for employers' and workers' organisations, accounting for 11.1 and 18.5 per cent respectively. The UNDP's financial contribution remained crucial, and its share stood at 45.9 per cent of the total volume of resources available to ILO technical cooperation.

67. The Governing Body also examined an Office assessment of selected ILO projects concerning migrants, refugees and displaced persons. This paper adopted a programme approach, rather than reviewing individual projects. It emphasised the opportunities that lay ahead in striving to involve the social partners in development efforts directed at such vulnerable target groups.

68. The Governing Body also examined further developments on operational activities questions in the United Nations system. These concerned the activities of the Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operational Activities) (CCSQ/OPS) of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC); the work of the Second Committee of the United Nations General Assembly concerning operational activities for development, which met in November 1990; the UNDP Governing Council (June 1991); and the work of the second ordinary session of ECOSOC concerning operational activities for development. The Governing Body reviewed developments in the light of the United Nations landmark resolution 44/211, which emphasised, inter alia, the shift from a project to a programme approach, direct execution by governments and greater recourse to multidisciplinary and multisectoral strategies.

69. Finally, the Governing Body took note of two reports undertaken by the United Nations Joint Inspection Unit concerning human resource development through technical cooperation and practices and procedures aimed at the more equitable geographical distribution of procurement for technical cooperation projects. The ILO received comments from the ACC on these reports.

M. STANDING BODIES AND MEETINGS

70. During the period under review, the Governing Body fixed the date, place, agenda and composition of meetings provided for in the programme and budget, took decisions as called for on the membership of standing bodies and appointed delegations to represent it at ILO meetings. It also reviewed information submitted by the Director-General on symposia, seminars and similar meetings financed under the regular budget and from extra-budgetary sources.

71. At its 251st Session the Governing Body considered and took note of the report of the Special Session of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers (CEART).

72. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body considered the record of the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference (Bangkok, 26 November-2 December 1991). It expressed its appreciation to the Government of Thailand for the facilities provided to the Conference, and to the Government and the employers' and workers' organisations of Thailand for the hospitality extended to participants. It authorised the Director-General to distribute the texts of the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Conference, requesting him to take the necessary measures for their implementation. These texts concerned growth and structural adjustment; occupational safety and health; the promotion of freedom of association in Asia; and migrant workers in Asia.

73. Also at its 252nd Session the Governing Body took note of the reports of the Meeting of Members of the Panel of Consultants on Workers' Education, the Tripartite Symposium on the Future of Social Security in Industrialised Countries, and the Tripartite European Meeting on the Impact of Technological Change on Work and Training. It authorised distribution of the reports, and requested the Director-General to take account of the recommendations they contained in drawing up future programme proposals.

74. During the period under review, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite various intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations to be represented at the present session of the Conference and at other ILO meetings.

N. INTERNATIONAL TRAINING CENTRE OF THE ILO, TURIN

75. At its 250th Session the Governing Body took note of the report on the 52nd Session of the Board of the International Training Centre of the ILO, held in May 1991, which was also discussed by its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. The report reviewed the work the Centre was carrying out under its new Development Plan, and presented the Centre's Programme and Budget for the current year and the proposals for 1992. During the period of execution of the Development Plan (1991-1995), a development fund was to be created in which the income and expenditure related to the Plan would be shown. The report noted the universal nature of the work of the Centre: some 146 countries were represented by participants in the courses for main mid-level management personnel and trainers, a considerable number of them from African countries and a greater number from Asia and Eastern Europe than in the past.

76. One of the most important characteristics of the Development Plan is the link with the ILO, its constituents and its objectives. Collaboration with the ILO's technical departments in the joint design and implementation of training activities was increasing. The Centre's door had also been opened to experience elsewhere in the United Nations system. The Consultative Committee on Substantive Questions (Operations) – CCSQ(OPS) – had given the Centre responsibility for designing and organising a series of workshops on the management of field co-ordination for senior representatives of the United Nations system.

77. The Centre still had to achieve financial stability: the report noted the increased support provided by Italy and contributions of a financial nature from Switzerland and France, as well as contributions in the form of staff and training activities from an increasing number of other countries. At its 251st Session the Governing Body took note of the report of an additional meeting of the Board of the Centre, communicating a decision to undertake consultations with the Vienna Council concerning the Management Institute for Training in Europe project, which wished to cooperate with the Centre and share its premises.

O. INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR LABOUR STUDIES

78. At its 251st Session, the Governing Body discussed and took note of the report on the 32nd Session of the Board of the Institute, held in November 1991. The Report dealt in particular with the Board's review of the report of the Director of the Institute on its activities in 1991 and his programme and budget proposals for the 1992-93 biennium. The Governing Body also accepted with gratitude a number of grants and contributions made to the Institute.

P. OTHER MATTERS

79. At its 251st Session the Governing Body took note that the Republic of Lithuania had rejoined the Organisation. At its 252nd Session it noted that Estonia and Latvia had rejoined the Organisation and that the Republic of Korea had taken up membership. Also at its 252nd Session the Governing Body took note that the membership of the USSR in the Organisation and its seat on the Governing Body would henceforth be held by the Russian Federation.

80. During the period under review, the Governing Body took note of information supplied in the Director-General's regular reports on the deaths of prominent ILO personalities, the progress of international labour legislation, internal administration and documents and publications issued by the Office. At its 251st Session the Governing Body paid tribute to the memory of Johan von Holten, Employer member of the Governing Body from Sweden, who died during the Governing Body's 251st Session. Mr. von Holten was a prominent member of the Governing Body for many years, acting in particular as spokesman for the Employers' group in the Governing Body's Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee.

81. The Governing Body at its 252nd Session approved for submission to the present session of the Conference a set of reforms to the procedures of regional conferences. Subject to their approval by the Conference, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to implement them, on a trial basis, at the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO, to be held in September-October 1902 in Caracas, Venezuela.

Report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa

(Harare, Zimbabwe, 5-8 May 1992)

Introduction

1. To give effect to the recommendation of the Committee on Action against Apartheid at the 77th (June 1990) and 78th (June 1991) Sessions of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office decided at its 251st Session (November 1991) to convene a tripartite conference on southern Africa. It decided to accept the offer of the Government of Zimbabwe to hold the meeting in Harare, Zimbabwe, from 5 to 8 May 1992.

2. The Governing Body decided that the composition of the Conference would be as follows: ten Government members, ten Employers' members and ten Workers' members designated by the Governing Body. In addition, an invitation to be represented by a tripartite delegation was extended to each of the front-line and neighbouring States, namely: Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Namibia, Swaziland, United Republic of Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe. It was understood that any other government wishing to participate in the meeting would be admitted as an observer and would have the right to speak.

3. Invitations to participate as observers were extended to the following organisations and liberation movements: United Nations, United Nations Special Commission Against Apartheid, United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, United Nations Development Programme, Organisation of African Unity, Southern African Labour Commission, Southern African Development Coordination Conference, Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern Africa, Commonwealth Secretariat, European Economic Commission, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, World Federation of Trade Unions, World Confederation of Labour, Organisation of African Trade Union Unity, Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council, International Organisation of Employers, Pan-African Employers' Organisation, Hassan Fathy Institute for Construction Workers, African Commission of Health and Human Rights Professionnals, the African National Congress of South Africa, the Pan-African Congress of Azania, and Palestine.

4. A list of participants is appended to the present report (Appendix II).

5. The Governing Body decided that the agenda of the Conference should comprise the following items:

(a) social, economic and labour aspects of subregional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa; and

(b) recent developments concerning apartheid in South Africa.

6. It was understood that the report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa would be submitted, together with the Director-General's Special Report on Apartheid, to the Committee on Discrimination at the 253rd Session of the Governing Body and to the Committee on Apartheid which would be set up by the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session in June 1992.

7. The Conference had before it the 1992 Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid; a paper entitled "Economic integration in the southern African subregion"; and a document entitled "Recent developments in South African labour relations".

8. The Conference unanimously elected as President Mr. John L. Nkomo, Minister of Labour, Manpower Planning and Social Welfare of Zimbabwe; as Employers' Vice-President Mr. Benildo G. Hernandez; as Workers' Vice-president Mrs. Shirley Carr; and as Reporter Mr. J. M. Pedersen, Government delegate of Denmark. The Conference also set up a Working Party to prepare the conclusions of the Conference; it was composed of three Government members (Indonesia, United States and Zambia); three Employers' members (Miss Hak, Mr. Hernandez and Mr. Okogwu); and three Workers' members (Mr. Chirwa, Mr. Tapiola and Mr. Sundaram). It was also decided that the Reporter of the Conference, Mr. Pedersen, would act as Chairman of the Working Party.

Opening sitting

9. The Conference was opened by the Secretary-General, Mr. Heribert Maier, Deputy-Director General of the International Labour Office, who conveyed the best wishes of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for its success. He thanked the Government and people of Zimbabwe for hosting for the second time in four years another ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, which focused on economic integration in the southern African subregion in general and on the final eradication of the vestiges of apartheid, particularly in view of the changes for transition to democracy that were taking place in South Africa.

10. This Conference was convened by the ILO on the initiative of the International Labour Conference. Two years previously, the Committee on Action against Apartheid had foreseen the need for such a meeting for the purpose of guiding the ILO policy towards South Africa and the entire southern African subregion. The ILO had shown time and again that it was capable of responding with maximum effectiveness to the call to combat apartheid. It could be proud of its record in the campaign to end apartheid, starting with its decisions in the 1960s to show the South African Government to what extent its apartheid policy was abhorred by the world of labour, including the unanimous adoption in 1964 of the first ILO Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid in the Republic of South Africa. The ILO thus acted as a spearhead for the organisations of the United Nations system in the fight against apartheid. In the same year, the decision was taken by the International Labour Conference to amend the ILO Constitution, providing for the exclusion from the Organisation of any State that practised racial discrimination. In the early 1970s there had already been clear movement within the United Nations system for a more trenchant approach, and the ILO joined with the UN in convening special international trade union meetings on apartheid in 1973 and again in 1977. These in turn led to the convening of the first Special Tripartite Conference on the subject which was held in Livingstone, Zambia, in 1981. That Conference led to the revision of the Declaration and the initiation of a programme of technical assistance to national liberation movements, trade unions and the front-line States. There was also a growing emphasis on the need for strong and concerted action by the international community to isolate the apartheid regime. Another Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa took place in 1984 in Lusaka and a third in Harare in 1988, which prepared the revised and updated Declaration and Programme of Action against Apartheid. It was largely the pressure built up through sanctions and the adoption of measures by ILO constituents, individually or as part of larger groupings, that enabled the international community to reinforce the efforts which were being made by the liberation organisations. The role of the front-line States had been a major determinant in the struggle against apartheid. The international community in general, and the ILO in particular, could be proud of the part they played in reaching the point where it was now possible to talk seriously and realistically about the day when apartheid would come to an end.

11. It was not for the ILO to say when that would occur. This was a matter for those directly involved; however, the ILO had been observing very closely the steps that had been taken in that direction since February 1990. The International Labour Conference had been conscious of its responsibility in this regard when, in his address to the ILO Conference in June 1990, Mr. Nelson Mandela had asked those who would to join him and "walk the last mile" along the road to that goal. The Special Reports of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid had clearly highlighted some of the pitfalls that were to be encountered along the way. These were illustrated in the complaint of COSATU concerning the violation of trade union rights that was currently being considered by the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association. In 1990, the state of labour legislation had also been the subject of technical cooperation assistance by the ILO at the request of the independent South African trade unions. But there was a great deal to be done before it could truly be said that apartheid has been replaced by a united, non-racial and democratic South Africa in which ILO values were observed. This would require on the part of the international community a combination of determination and flexibility with a willingness to make specialised contributions that were both necessary and possible. In this connection, the ILO had a unique role to play in the field of labour. This kind of determination was reflected most clearly in the resolutions that had been adopted by consensus at the General Assembly of the United Nations over the previous three years, starting with the Declaration on Apartheid and its Destructive Consequences for Southern Africa and followed most recently on 14 December last year by Resolution 46/79A on International Efforts towards the Total Eradication of Apartheid and Support for the Establishment of a United, Non-Racial and Democratic South Africa. Those decisions were of paramount importance and they should form the basis for further concerted action. While this action should involve pressure for substantive change, it should also pave the way for the provision of assistance to those who were actively engaged in promoting this change. It was in this context that the present Conference should undertake the task of responding to recent developments that had occurred in South Africa and consider their implications for southern Africa as a whole. Concerning both of these questions, the Conference had before it documents outlining some of the issues to be considered. The Conference would no doubt wish to receive guidance from the principal bodies involved in dealing with these matters on a day-to-day basis. It was they who would know best how they might benefit from the continued engagement of the international community, including the ILO. The ILO was ready to respond in the most effective manner possible to requests received from within South Africa and would seek to coordinate its activities with the rest of the UN system as well as with relevant regional organisations. But here, as elsewhere, there was a need for clear guidance on what was required and where it might best be provided. South Africa's policy of apartheid had not only had destructive consequences inside the country itself but elsewhere in the subcontinent as well, both through the destabilisation policies pursued and by the sanctions imposed as a result of apartheid. The task that lay ahead to dismantle apartheid, establish a society based on justice and human dignity and promote economic integration in the southern African subregion was immense. That, too, would be the responsibility of those directly involved in securing the future of all the peoples of southern Africa. The ILO would stand ready to act where its specialised capacity was required. While South Africa had not yet reached the stage at which the goals of the international community were being realised, it was nearing the point where decisive action had to be taken to ensure that the process of change would not be reversed. The ILO has a very real contribution to make in seeing that this was achieved. The present Conference should outline the ways in which it might do so, faithful to its role as a standard-bearer of enlightened action in the field of social justice, human rights and the achievement of dignity for all those in the world of labour.

12. The President of the Conference, in welcoming participants to Zimbabwe, stated that he and his compatriots were gratified that, four years after the Tripartite Conference on Action against Apartheid organised by the ILO in 1988, Harare had once again been chosen as the venue for another conference on this extremely important issue. Presiding over such a conference was a very humbling experience, given enormity of the task, the complexity of the issues and the passion aroused by South Africa. This was so because the situation in South Africa was in a state of flux. Changes were taking place every day and the country experienced violence in one form or another by the week, if not by the day. While these events concerned all delegates present at the Conference, they particularly affected those who lived in the subregion, for whom the questions of regional integration and collective prosperity were of crucial importance. In view of the statement made by the Secretary-General concerning the problems currently facing the subregion, busy days lay ahead of the delegates to the Conference. However, he was convinced that the Conference would succeed in its task and would conduct its deliberations in a businesslike and constructive manner.

Special sitting

13. The Conference held a special sitting on Wednesday, 6 May 1992, at which it was honoured by the presence of His Excellency the President of the Republic of Zimbabwe, Mr. Robert Mugabe. His address to the Conference is reproduced in Appendix I.

14. The Secretary-General of the Conference welcomed Mr Mugabe for the second time to an ILO Conference on southern Africa. He recalled the role played by Mr. Mugabe in bringing his country to independence. Since his accession to the presidency, Mr. Mugabe had provided material and moral support to the national liberation movements in South Africa, fought racial bigotry and resisted all pressures to soften his country's position against apartheid. Much remained to be done, but President Mugabe could rest assured that the sacrifices endured by his country in the struggle for the liberation of southern Africa had not been in vain. The ILO could not have a better source of inspiration than the message of this freedom-fighter in walking the last mile on the road to freedom, democracy and justice.

15. His Excellency President Robert Mugabe extended a warm welcome to the Conference on behalf of the Government and people of Zimbabwe and on his own behalf. He noted that this was the fourth Conference of this nature in 11 years convened to assess the progress made towards the dismantling of apartheid and to recommend appropriate action to that effect. The previous Conferences had condemned apartheid in the strongest terms and recommended actions to undermine it. President Mugabe pointed out that apartheid had manifested itself in labour matters and in political, economic and social affairs. The system of apartheid had turned South Africans into refugees in the front-line States and had inflamed racial hatred and impoverished the Black population. Acts of destabilisation had been perpetrated against neighbouring States with the intention of undermining their support for the struggle against apartheid. Apartheid thus forced the front-line States to spend heavily on defence. However, this Conference was meeting in an atmosphere of hope that apartheid's days were numbered. Positive developments had taken place in recent months, including the repeal of the main apartheid laws, the release of political prisoners, the unbanning of political organisations and the return of exiles. The formation of CODESA and the result of the March referendum had revealed that Whites were committed to political reform through dialogue. President Mugabe expressed distress at the escalating violence in South Africa, and believed that divide-and-rule tactics would plunge South Africa into chaos from which no one would benefit. The lack of common purpose and unity among the opposition forces was thus a mater of concern and he urged them to pursue unity. Nonetheless, he remained optimistic that a democratic order would emerge in South Africa, and called on the international community to play an active role in dismantling apartheid by encouraging the democratic process in South Africa. He commended the ILO for its role in the struggle against apartheid and the contribution it had made through the training and technical services provided to the national liberation movements, Black workers and their trade unions and the assistance rendered to neighbouring States. The ILO had continued to monitor and compile reports which provded valuable information to its members and the international community. He observed that economic development required a stable environment and that African States had faced unfavourable and even hostile circumstances in recent years, and the 1990s offered little cheer. There were efforts under way to form an African Economic Community as a continental framework for the development of human and material resources in order to promote trade and socio-economic development. The discussions and conclusions of this Conference should enable the ILO to adopt an appropriate posture towards South Africa and to formulate a programme of action to facilitate the process of reform in that country.

16. The Employers' Vice-President on behalf of the Employers' group expressed gratitude to President Mugabe for providing the necessary inspiration and advice for the Conference to attain its goals and conclusions.

17. The Workers' Vice-President stated that it was an honour for the Workers' group to attend this second Conference in Harare when the abolition of apartheid was in sight. President Mugabe had given direction to the Conference and confirmed the important role of the ILO. Mr. Mugabe's loyalty was based on the experience of Zimbabwe in striving for democracy. The Workers' group hoped that the Conference report would be one of which President Mugabe could be proud.

Discussion of the items on the agenda of the Conference

18. The Employers' Vice-President observed that the Conference marked an important chapter in the relations of southern African States and came at a time when their economic and political relationships were being reassessed. This reassessment was made in the light of encouraging developments in South Africa aimed at the dismantling of apartheid and the establishment of an interim government. In the aftermath of apartheid greater cooperation and understanding amongst the social partners would be needed to meet the important social and economic challenges arising from the resulting changes in the region. The democratisation of all institutions in South Africa would involve economic activities – a growth in investment and entrepreneurship throughout the region. These activities would place great demands on human resources in the region; the ILO should be called upon to assist im improving these resources. Regional institutions and mechanisms for coordination and cooperation in these economic activities needed to be strengthened. The ILO could also play a role in this regard. This strengthening should not, however, be based on solutions coming from other places just because they were thought to be superior: foreign expertise was significant where it complements rather than supplants local, national and regional initiatives. The views of the Conference would help to guide programmes and activities to revitalise tripartism and implementation of international labour standards in all countries in the subregion. In this regard, the recent seminar on "Prospects for the creation of a representative body of employers in South Africa" was noteworthy and further comments on its conclusions would be provided during the conference.

19. The Workers' Vice-President observed that prospects for the creation of a non-racial and democratic South Africa had emerged from the repeal of the major legislative pillars of the apartheid system. The Workers had welcomed their repeal in June last year. Negotiations toward the complete end of apartheid were welcomed and their success was hoped for. The process of negotiation was not, however, the same as the abolition of apartheid; the process was a fragile one which should be supported and encouraged by all means. In this context, the work undertaken by the ILO was far from over; there should be no weakening of the resolve to eliminate the apartheid system completely, and this resolve should be communicated to the South African Government. Likewise, maximum pressure on the present Government should be continued by the maintenance of isolation. Sanctions, especially with respect to arms, oil and financial relations, should be continued in line with United Nations policy. Migration from outside of southern Africa should also be discouraged. The report on recent developments in South Africa reminded the Conference that basic worker rights had not been extended to farm, domestic and public sector employees, contrary to a South African Government promise to that effect. This failure was to be denounced; basic worker rights should be granted to all workers in all areas of South Africa. The positive work the ILO had undertaken in southern Africa over the years, particularly in assisting trade unions, should be intensified. Trade unions in the subregion had indicated that priority should be attached to the provision of technical, vocational and basic education, as well as education and training of migrant workers, job creation, harmonisation of labour laws, improvement of working conditions, promotion of equality of opportunity, strengthening of rural worker organisations and development of a code of conduct for multinational companies. In these areas the ILO could play an important role. The legacy of apartheid, seen very clearly in the inequalities apparent in all aspects of the society and highlighted in the background report of the Conference, would be felt long after apartheid was abolished. The international community, including the ILO, should be immediately ready to address these inequalities with massive assistance during the transitional and post-apartheid period. At a time when developments in regional integration were being noted, it was appropriate to welcome the process of democratisation which could be observed in some countries in the subregion. This process should be encouraged and accompanied by supportive social and economic policies. Trade unions should play an important role in the development of these policies. In this regard, the Workers were shocked that Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary General of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council, had recently been arrested in Malawi, apparently for calling for democratic reform in that country, and was at present in jail. Furthermore, persons working in the SATUCC offices had also been arrested and the offices closed. The Workers deplored most strongly the arrest of this trade unionist for the exercise of his basic rights and called for his immediate release, as well as the release of his colleagues, including Ngwira and for the reopening of SATUCC offices.

20. The representative of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid stated that the positive developments inside South Africa would have repercussions throughout southern Africa, benefiting all countries in the area. Although it was hoped that negotiations would lead to a transitional administration in the country, the Special Committee perceived that these developments needed to be viewed with caution. The results of the March referendum bolstered hope that the negotiations would succeed and relived certain concerns in the Special Committee. Cooperation among South Africans and between States in the subregion was envisaged by the Special Committee, as tangible indications of such cooperation were already evident. On the question of social, economic and labour development, it was feared that, although key apartheid legislation had been repealed, if socio-economic inequities are not decisively addressed, the dramatic legacies of the system could remain entrenched in policies and structures of the State – both in the public and private sectors. The United Nations had long been aware of this reality and was in the process of defining its role in respect of South Africa's socio-economic difficulties. To this end, a seminar was to be convened in Namibia in May 1992 which would increase awareness of the international community of the socio-economic legacy of apartheid, provide a better indication of the future technical assistance needs, and propose a preliminary identification of priority areas and broad policy orientations for future technical assistance. The Tripartite Conference had an obligation to determine how best the international community could assist southern Africa to integrate and realign the subregional economy in the interest of all.

21. The Employers' member of Nigeria noted that the background paper for the Conference delved into many areas of interest and genuine importance; by way of warning, however, it should be recalled that the Director-General had, at a recent meeting of the Governing Body, observed that the ILO could be effective only if it concentrated its efforts and resources in areas where it had a clear mandate, where it was uniquely competent and where it could have a real impact. In this context, the work of the ILO in southern Africa would be most appropriate in a number of specific fields. First, as regards unemployment, the ILO should monitor and give advice concerning the social problems arising from the reduction of public sector employment and alleviation of unemployment and underemployment. Second, with respect to migrant labour, the unemployment and loss of remittances resulting from the decline of this system could be the focus of ILO assistance in terms of reorientation and deployment of manpower, vocational training and retraining. Third, the ILO could assist in seriously examining and promoting the growth of the informal sector, as it would play an important role in reducing unemployment. Fourth, the ILO could assist in strengthening existing institutional arrangements for economic cooperation in the region, in particular SADCC. Fifth, the ILO should be called upon to help strengthen implementation of international labour standards, and in particular, those related to tripartite and bipartite mechanisms and equality of opportunity. Lastly, the areas identified in section 6 of the Conference background paper were all relevant to future ILO involvement in the area.

22. The Employers' member of the Netherlands, speaking for the Employers' group, recalled a conclusion made by the 1991 Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid which called for action to be taken to form a non-racial employers' organisation within South Africa. To this end, a seminar on "Prospects for the creation of a representative body of employers in South Africa" was held in Harare in January 1992. At that meeting, representatives of FABCOS, NAFCOC and SACCOLA expressed their agreement on the principle of the creation of a unified and representative non-racial umbrella organisation of employers in South Africa which was able to represent and defend the common interests of its constituents, while preserving their specificity and identity. These organisations unanimously agreed to initiate the implementation of this objective by reporting on the proceedings of the seminar to their respective organisations and to recommend to them the establishment as soon as possible of a joint working party to study the various aspects of the creation of such an organisation, and to make proposals to this effect in due time. Participants at the seminar also unanimously agreed on the guiding principles for the formation of such an organisation: it must be truly accountable and responsible to its membership in order to represent fairly their views and interests and to maintain the legitimacy and authority which would enable it to enjoy the confidence of its partners; it should be committed to the free enterprise system and to the essentials of a market economy; and it should be completely independent of government authorities, political parties, trade unions or any other group outside the employers' interests. Following the seminar, an employers' mission had gone to South Africa and they were now pleased to report that a working party had been established and a meeting convened. Although progress was expected to be difficult and time-consuming, the working party would convene a plenary meeting within a few months after appropriate preparations. The International Organisation of Employers has also proposed further areas of assistance. The IOE would wait for their South African colleagues to call for its execution. The ILO should act to assist employers and it was hoped that the Conference would recommend to the International Labour Conference that ILO experts should go to South Africa to explore employer needs (if necessary, to the exclusion of the Government) and be ready to implement assistance programmes when an interim government was established.

23. The Workers' member of Pakistan noted the Secretary-General's comments regarding ILO action against apartheid and hoped that it would continue. Workers in Pakistan had observed developments in South Africa with great interest and hoped that trade unions in South Africa would be fully associated with efforts to incorporate within the new constitution the fullest possible range of trade union rights. ILO assistance to the trade union movement in the subregion should be continued; in this regard, the seminar on "Trade union participation in development of socio-economic policies" held just prior to the Tripartite Conference should be noted. These conclusions, as well as the background paper to the Conference, considered that great efforts would be needed to eradicate the gross inequities resulting from the system of apartheid and to eliminate the suffering of the victims of apartheid. Greater effect should thus be given to the application of international labour standards and ILO activities in this regard, as well as with respect to worker education, freedom of association, elimination of child labour and discrimination against women. International assistance should also be given to relieve victims of the recent drought and to improve local infrastructure. The Conference could be assured that the Workers' group was committed to dismantling apartheid completely by supporting continuation of sanctions with respect to arms, finances and oil.

24. The Government member of the United States indicated that his Government had sent a delegation to the present Conference because it believed that apartheid should be eradicated. A non-racial, multi-party democracy which protected human rights and which was based upon a market economy was his country's goal for the new South Africa. The movement towards democracy was irreversible and work towards the elimination of apartheid had come a long way; however, the fight was by no means over. It should be observed that the ILO's Declaration Against Apartheid was now badly out of date as, among other things, it called on member countries to break relations with South Africa; this remained the call even now, at a time when countries were re-establishing relations weekly. Accordingly, the representative asked that the 79th International Labour Conference recommend a review of the Declaration.

25. The Workers' member of Finland commented that the background document for the Conference had not sufficiently addressed social or labour-market issues in its analysis of economic integration in the subregion. It was logical that the objective of regional integration should be the improved welfare of the people; because of this, a wholly economic analysis which ignored social and political issues would not suffice. The social dimensions of economic development and structural change in integration had to be considered when the Conference drew up its conclusions. As regards the content of the report, the oibjective of regional balance could have been more explicitly elaborated. This balance should be both between countries and within individual States; it should be based on the involvement of the social partners in policy-making. With respect to investment policy, this should be elaborated in view of relevant ILO instruments, including the ILO Declaration on Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. Such policies should call for respect for trade union rights, promotion of collective bargaining and employment, elimination of discrimination, security of employment, protection of the environment, equitable transfer of technology and respect for safety and health in the workplace. Respect for tripartite participation was also called for by these instruments. Likewise, protection of the environment and occupational safety and health were linked to investment policy, human resources development and infrastructure development, and they should not be overlooked in the conclusions of the Conference. Respect for the principles of freedom of association, which would speed up the complete dismantling of apartheid, should be recognised as a condition for the successful implementation of structural adjustment programmes.

26. The observer of the United Nations Special Committee against Apartheid commented that the Special Committee had prided itself upon its close cooperation with employers' and workers' organisations and with national liberation movements in its work.

27. The Government representative of Zambia considered that the timing of the Conference was opportune, in view of the developments taking place in the region. These developments were welcome and evidence of support for them were to be found in the results of the recent referendum amongst White voters in South Africa. Violence, however, threatened the reform process and was to be deplored. The final elimination of apartheid would be more quickly brought about where the parties concerned were unified in their resolve and operating in an environment free of violence. It should be observed that in a world of close economic interdependence, all countries in southern Africa suffered as a result of the economic sanctions against South Africa. This sacrifice was, however, necessary to eradicate the crime against humanity which was apartheid. As sanctions were gradually lifted, all States within the region should be involved in efforts to create and strengthen mutually beneficial relationships. In this connection, Zambia desired to establish open economic relations, not only with SADCC and PTA members, but also with the emerging South Africa. It was felt that such relations would be mutually beneficial and would facilitate democratisation. Notwithstanding these developments, Zambia's resolve to eliminate apartheid completely remained undiminished. Support would continue to be given to the CODESA process and ongoing negotiations, which would hopefully lead to the establishment of a democratic society. The international community, including the ILO, should stand ready to continue to provide assistance to ensure the smooth integration of the new South Africa to the wider international community. In his capacity as the current Chairman of the Southern African Labour Commission (SALC), the speaker indicated that SALC had embarked on a reorientation of its activities, broadening them beyond issues relating to migrant labour. At a recent meeting, issues discussed included employment creation, strengthening of ministries of labour, improvement of human and workers' rights, conditions of work and environment. In this connection, a Workers' Social Charter for Southern Africa dealing primarily with trade union rights and activities had been adopted. Support for the activities of the Commission was solicited from the Conference. Lastly, assistance from the international community was called for to help address the hardships caused by the diversion of scarce national resources made necessary by the recent drought in the subregion.

28. The Government representative of the Russian Federation stressed that violence and bloodshed were continuing in South Africa. The difference was that while previously it had been predominantly Whites who killed Blacks, now Blacks were being murdered by other Blacks. The death toll was counted not in tens of victims as before, but in hundreds. The violent situation in South Africa was not incidental: it had been conceived and was still being triggered by those who opposed, and strove to obstruct, the process of reforms initiated by peaceful forces in South African society. This was done in an attempt to reverse the process of reforms or at least delay it for as long as possible. The importance and magnitude of the changes taking place in South Africa were unparalleled. Mr. F. W. de Klerk and Mr. N. Mandela would secure their place in the history of mankind, provided that the reforms they had embarked upon were carried to their logical conclusion. These men had proved beyond doubt that it was possible to overcome one of the greatest tragedies of the twentieth century – the apartheid system based on bloodshed, racial intolerance and humiliation, economic dominance and armed force – through negotiation and compromise, and not through mutual destruction. His country, formerly the Soviet Union, had never accepted apartheid and had always assisted those who fought it. Yet, it could not condone the brutal philosophy of "one White – one bullet", which was anachronistic in the contemporary civilised world. A parallel could be drawn between the events in South Africa and those in his country, which had embarked on a programme of democratic reforms. From their own experience, the people of his country were fully aware that the road to reform was long and paved with obstacles. The people of the Russian Federation, which comprised 130 ethnic groups, understood the fears of national and ethnic minorities in South Africa, who were keen to find their own place in the new non-racial and democratic society. While it was normal to wish for immediate results, patience and understanding were needed.

The CODESA talks were only the very beginning of this long process. Upon cessation of the policy of apartheid it would be necessary to dismantle the structures of this system, change its economic basis, social and labour relations within society, as well as attitudes. This had to be done step by step. Social and economic problems should be resolved within the framework of a democratic society. Prosperity and stability in South Africa could be achieved only in this manner, and not by inflicting impoverishment, mass unemployment, bloodshed and violence on the people. His country supported the dismantling of apartheid by political means and was prepared to make its contribution so that this could be achieved as soon as possible. It was up to the participants in the CODESA talks to determine the constitutional forms which this process would eventually assume. It was of crucial importance that the international community, in its overwhelming majority, had accepted the fact that the elimination of the apartheid system was an irreversible process, and that there was no alternative for South Africa in the context of modern, civilised international relations. The international community could certainly not remain indifferent to the events taking place in that country. As long as apartheid persisted, the world community had to remain vigilant. That is why there could not be agreement with those who consider the ILO Declaration on Action Against Apartheid obsolete, though no doubt, it does need updating. What should be changed, however, was the traditionally confrontational attitude which had been adopted toward the South African Government, which was now conducting reforms. The international community had been lagging behind events occurring in South Africa, for the process of dialogue in that country was accelerating in a way which had never been anticipated. He was therefore particularly pleased to note that the ILO had been foremost among those who had been actively involved in planning for the future of southern Africa. The ILO had set a good example for other international bodies which still had to formulate their strategies in view of the rapidly changing situation in the region. There was now a unique opportunity to demonstrate to the world the contribution that could be made by the United Nations and its specialised agencies to a peaceful political and socio-economic reconstruction in the region, following the victory of reason over the forces of destruction. The ILO report contained useful conclusions and his Government was prepared, within the limits of its resources, to cooperate with the southern African nations and assist them in obtaining social and economic progress and greater economic independence. However, such measures were unlikely to succeed if there were not sound political and military security in the region, mutual political and economic trust, and a substantial reduction in the military budgets of countries in the region in order to meet social and economic challenges. It might be expedient to hold a special international conference on security and cooperation in southern Africa which would assist the countries of the region in elaborating appropriate strategies to address this crucial issue: this conference would bring together representatives of liberation movements as well as those of the Government of South Africa. During the early eighties Mr. Chester Crocker, then Assistant Secretary of State of the United States, had advanced the concept of "constructive engagement". At that time, the concept had been justifiably criticised. Now the time was right to translate the concept into practical action.

29. The Workers' Vice-President, speaking on behalf of the Workers' group, observed that the Conference was meeting in southern Africa at a time of hope, but it was hope with mixed feelings because the question was no longer whether things would change, but when. The Workers had listened carefully in their group meetings to the representatives of COSATU and NACTU who had informed them of the current situation in South Africa. It had been stated the previous day that the promises made to reform labour legislation had not been fulfilled and that in fact the Government had hardened its attitude since the March referendum. COSATU and NACTU had also indicated that the continued violence in South Africa, which had cost so many lives, was due to the "twin-track" approach adopted by the Government in its negotiations. It was therefore important to exercise maximum pressure on South Africa. This involved the continuation of sanctions, particularly in respect of arms, oil and financial relations in line with the United Nations policy. Sanctions should be maintained so as to guarantee change until the democratic trade unions, COSATU and NACTU, as well as the national liberation movements decided otherwise. It was particularly necessary to maintain sanctions on all types of technology and equipment intended for use by the South African armed forces and to prohibit any sale of machinery to arms-producing companies, any provision of nuclear technology and any cooperation with the South African Government in these areas. Financial sanctions including new loans and credits as well as the oil embargo should also be maintained. The ILO, which had played a vital role in the fight against apartheid, should continue to respond positively to the requests for support from democratic trade unions and national liberation movements. However, it was perhaps premature for the ILO to operate in South Africa at this stage and the Workers' group felt that the ILO should wait until an interim government had been established in the country. The Workers also felt that it was important to work with employers' organisations, provided that such organisations were non-racial. The Workers were aware that things were changing daily in South Africa. During this period of transition, it was important to negotiate with all the social forces to eliminate inequalities and poverty which could only obstruct the process of democratisation. It was therefore essential for political change to be accompanied by a programme of affirmative action to promote the social transformation required to establish and sustain a new culture of democracy. It was in this context that the United Nations General Assembly, in its Resolution 46/79 adopted in December 1991, appealed to the international community to increase its material, financial and other contributions to the victims and opponents of apartheid, to help them address the socio-economic inequalities, particularly in the areas of education, health, housing and social welfare. There was no doubt that the fields of education and training should be given priority if the improvement of living conditions and genuine social stability were to be achieved. The Black population should be able to accede rapidly to posts of responsibility at all levels of the various social institutions, in particular in public administration, the legal and judicial apparatus, the police, security services, the armed forces, the educational system and the private sector. For this purpose the Black population should be provided with the skills required by an expanding economy. This involved literacy, technical and vocational training programmes and the establishment of vocational guidance services. In view of the inadequacies of the current educational system, the problems of too many school drop-outs and the effects of the job reservation system, it was essential to open up on a wide scale, institutions for vocational training and the upgrading of skills for workers already in employment and to ensure that the training provided was matched to the skills required by the labour market. It was also important for these programmes to make it possible to respond to the needs of the long-term unemployed, which now represented nearly 42 per cent of jobseekers. These training establishments should therefore carefully plan and organise this massive exercise and major employers should also provide the necessary resources to establish training centres and centres for upgrading the skills of workers. The democratic trade unions had an important role to play in this field and should be involved from the planning and implementation stages. The trade unions themselves might also wish to establish education and training centres. Maximum support should be extended to democratic trade unions through vigorous assistance programmes adapted to the needs of the transition period. Priority areas for such support should include the provision of the basic trade union education for rank and file trade union members to promote and deepen a democratic culture.

30. These courses could also address the problems of equality, occupational health and safety, the environment and literacy. Trade union education and training should be provided to trade union leaders at all levels, from the shop floor to mangement level, negotiators, economists, researchers, educators, etc., so as to provide them with the skills required for the development of sound trade union organisations and the establishment of an effective industrial relations system. In all these activities it would be necessary to ensure equality of opportunity between men and women. Concerning immigration she noted that, over the previous few years, the South African Government had encouraged the immigration of skilled and semi-skilled workers, particularly from Eastern Europe. These White immigrants had been given preferential treatment as regards training and employment, even when local workers were available or could be trained for these posts. Moreover, the White immigrants were often paid more than their local counterparts. It was important for the ILO to discourage this immigration vigorously as long as a new democratic constitution was not in place. In the field of basic human and trade union rights, the ILO should continue to support the struggle of democratic trade unions to develop these rights in South Africa. The ILO should support the efforts of democratic trade unions to ensure that basic trade union rights such as the right of workers to belong to trade unions, trade union independence from governments, employers and political parties, the right to resort to strike action, freedom of association and expression, were embodied in the new constitution of South Africa. In this connection, particular attention should be paid to farmworkers, domestic workers, public sector employees and workers in the bantustans who were still denied these rights. The ILO should also support the efforts of these trade unions to ensure the ratification of the main international labour Conventions. The trade unions of the subregion had defined a certain number of priority areas which they hoped would be included in the ILO programme of action for southern Africa. These were as follows: (a) technical and vocational training for workers; (b) harmonisation and improvement of labour laws; (c) promotion of equality of opportunity; (d) strengthening of rural and agricultural workers' organisations; (e) migration of labour; (f) upgrading of labour standards; (g) development of a code of conduct for multinational companies.

31. The question of a code of conduct should be considered in depth. The idea was not new and codes of this kind already existed in South Africa. What was now required was a unified code, the negotiation of which should involve all the social partners, and this code should take account of the ILO's Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. The code could be established along the following lines:

(1) Background

The introduction would include the following: (a) apartheid-related legislation still exists on the statute book in some areas of life (i.e. detention without trial); (b) labour legislation does not cover all sectors of employment (i.e. farm, domestic, public sector employees and bantustan workers); (c) the legacy of apartheid does not end when apartheid laws are removed from the statute book.

(2) General principles

Multinationals would have to abide by: (a) ILO Conventions, as minimum standards; (b) social and labour laws and regulations in South Africa, where they are not below the minimum standards as stipulated by the ILO.

(3) Application of the code

(a) Employment creation; (b) Equality of opportunity and treatment in employment; (c) Security of employment; (d) Occupational and environmental health safety; (e) Training and education; (f) Development of science and transfer of technology; (g) Conditions of work and life; (h) Trade union and worker rights; (i) Disinvestment.

(4) Mechanism for follow-up action

(a) Implementation committee; (b) Monitoring forum; (c) Reporting and assessment; (d) Follow-up in home countries.

32. Finally, considering southern Africa as a whole, she observed that this region of the world had experienced instability for too long, for most of the post-colonial period has been devoted to fighting White minority regimes. The infrastructure of these countries had been destroyed due to the destabilisation policies conducted by South Africa and the price paid by the populations was incalculable. The prospects for establishing a new, non-racial and democratic society in South Africa now offered a hope for peace, economic development and prosperity in the subregion. The latter, however, now had to face serious economic problems which were only compounded by the terrible drought which had aggravated unemployment. The governments should involve the social partners in the solution of these problems. Social and economic policies thus devised would gain greater credibility and wider acceptance. The trade unions of the subregion were ready to play an active role. Respect for fundamental rights remained the crucial element in social progress. It was important to note that some governments had joined employers' and workers' organisations in adopting in March 1992 a Social Charter for the Workers of southern Africa. This Charter, which had been the subject of intense discussions for almost 18 months between the trade unions of southern Africa, including those of South Africa, drew extensively on social rights enshrined in international labour instruments. It was adopted through the southern African Labour Commission, which had recently become tripartite. In southern Africa priority should be given to efforts aimed at harmonising social and economic policies which promoted balanced economic growth in the subregion. For this purpose, the ILO should increase its support to job creation programmes and insist that the South African Government end any assistance to the forces of destabilisation in the subregion and that it work towards harmonious relations between neighbouring States, based on the principle of mutual respect for their sovereignty. The ILO should support the work of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council and call on governments of the subregion to implement fully the Social Charter of Workers' Rights adopted recently in Lusaka, Zambia. She once again stressed the need for the ILO to continue its efforts to assist migrant workers in southern Africa and to devote additional resources to their technical and vocational training, to job creation and possibilities for their return to their countries of origin. This could be done through small-scale socio-economic projects or the creation of cooperatives aimed at integrating migrant workers in their home countries. These programmes should be undertaken in collaboration with the trade unions of the subregion, in particular within the framework of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council. The governments of the subregion should also give immediate priority to programmes aimed specifically at creating employment possibilities for migrant workers in which the social partners should be fully involved. It was also necessary to consult and collaborate with them regularly for the formulation and implementation of all policies concerning migrant workers. It was particularly important for the ILO to assist in the creation of the mechanisms required for social dialogue and harmonious labour relations. These were the essential pillars of national infrastructure that were indispensable for the elaboration and implementation of workable and democratic economic and social programmes. In this connection, the ILO should ensure that it fully played its role with the international financial institutions as well as with governments in the region to ensure that vital social concerns were taken into account in the framework of structural adjustment policies and programmes.

33. The observer of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), speaking by agreement with the Officers of the Conference, observed that the ILO Committee on Action against Apartheid had an unequalled record in alleviating the plight of the majority of South Africans who were fighting apartheid. COSATU was deeply grateful to all those democrats who had supported this struggle and who continued to assist them in building a new South Africa, founded on genuine freedom and economic and social justice. While the future undeniably held great prospects, it would be erroneous to assume that apartheid had come to an end. The vast majority of people in South Africa were still disenfranchised and though certain apartheid laws had been removed from the statute books, structural apartheid that had excluded the Black majority and condemned them to poverty, homelessness and unemployment, still remained deeply entrenched in society. CODESA, as a process to negotiate an end to apartheid, had still not yielded concrete results. All that had been obtained from the de Klerk regime was an agreement to reach agreement. The fruits of such an agreement would only emerge from CODESA II. The process of reform could only be deemed irreversible when the present regime relinquished power and agreed to the creation of an interim government or a transitional mechanism. This interim government should have the specific objective of preparing for the free and fair election of a constituent assembly. This meant that control had to be exercised over the monolithic state media – which had always acted as the propaganda arm of the Nationalist Party – the security forces, finances and international relations, so that impartiality could be ensured. In the political sphere, COSATU envisaged that once elections had been held for a constituent assembly, this body would act as a legislative organ and would draft the constitution for a new South Africa. All the machinery of the apartheid regime was expected to be dissolved. In the economic sphere, COSATU was concerned by the fact that the apartheid regime, backed by major businesses, had been unilaterally restructuring the economy. This measure was intended to concentrate all economic power in the hands of the White minority, to sabotage a future Government's capacity to introduce programmes for the benefit of the majority and to finance its election campaign. The trade unions of South Africa were not prepared to see the real issues of apartheid swept under the carpet. They had resisted all attempts at unilateral economic restructuring and had argued for the establishment of a tripartite forum for negotiations on economic issues. While employers had agreed in principle to this forum, the absence of a single, national employers' organisation considerably slowed down the process of negotiations. Furthermore, the Government had hitherto resisted attempts to bring it into this forum. He believed that only an approach which involved all the parties concerned could lead to stability. A strategy of economic growth required coherent policies on industrial restructuring, technology, training and investment. Such growth should not only meet the social and economic needs of the majority, but should also make South Africa more competitive in the world economy. The ILO was well placed to provide assistance in this process. While COSATU sought the continued assistance of the ILO, it was felt that preparatory work should be done so that appropriate programmes could be implemented once an interim government was in place. First, this should be done in a way that did not assist or give credibility to the present regime or other vested White interests. Second, the ILO should insist that technical cooperation was based on the ILO Declaration Concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa as well as on its conventions. Third, such assistance should strengthen tripartite institutions in South Africa and address the fundamental socio-economic problems faced by the majority of people. Fourth, there should be greater coordination between international organisations in providing assistance to South Africa so as to avoid duplication of efforts, an ad hoc approach to technical cooperation and unnecessary bureaucratic expenses. Fifth, COSATU believed that economic development in southern Africa could only be pursued in a context free from antagonism, for regional economic integration and respect for trade union and human rights required a viable foundation. Finally, the ILO should now, and in the future, monitor the implementation of agreements such as the Laboria Minute whereby both the present Government and employers agreed to extend basic rights to all workers. At present these agreements, which had been signed in 1990, had still not been fully implemented and millions of farmworkers, domestic workers and public sector employees did not enjoy trade union rights. Many were even denied basic legislation on working conditions and unemployment insurance. Furthermore, COSATU believed that the recommendations and report of the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, which had visited South Africa in February 1992, should form the basis of further negotiations on the framing of appropriate labour legislation and the establishment of labour market institutions. Concerning investment in South Africa, the trade union movement had argued strongly for a code of conduct on multinational corporations. While COSATU conceded that investment sought returns, it opposed the type of investment that abused trade union and human rights. Profitable investment could be achieved even if there were guarantees of negotiations on employment creation, equality of opportunity, occupational safety and health, environmental protection, training and education, trade union and workers' rights as well as other rights. Maximum pressure should be maintained, so as to compel the White regime to agree to the establishment of an interim government and constituent assembly. The violence sweeping the country was due to the resistance of the ruling class to the winds of change. This violence was certainly confusing to the outside world and was particularly disturbing to the people of South Africa. South Africans were ready to establish a representative, democratic government which would act decisively against the causes of violence in the context of the national peace accord, exercise tigther control on the security forces, so as to ensure the arrest and prosecution of those who orchestrated the violence and support a proactive judiciary that was already becoming aware of the interests of the majority. The present Conference would make a decisive contribution to empowering the vast majority of people who had suffered under apartheid. The task of rebuilding South Africa had already begun. The ILO could make a meaningful contribution in close consultation with those organisations that had been in the forefront of the struggle for a non-racial, democratic, non-sexist and united South Africa.

34. The observer of the National Council of Trade Unions (NACTU), speaking by agreement with the Officers of the Conference, stated that the Conference was expected to make recommendations to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference in the light of the changes currently taking place in South Africa. NACTU wished to put these changes into perspective by pointing out that the CODESA negotiations were part of a process leading to the end of apartheid; they did not constitute the end of apartheid. Indeed, the South African Government had begun manoeuvring to maintain power despite the dismantling of apartheid. This was being done through unilateral restructuring of the economy and refusal to address the violence which effectively destabilised anti-apartheid activities. NACTU and COSATU demanded an end to unilateral actions to restructure the economy and sought the institution of a tripartite Economic Negotiating Forum with the mandate to discuss and decide upon a wide range of social and economic issues. The Government needed also to act to end the violence. The Conference could make its conclusions only in the light of this posturing by the current Government. The ILO should not send the wrong signals to the Government by its premature entrance into the country. It should come into South Africa only when a transitional authority or interim government was in place. This authority should be there only to prepare for elections of a constituent assembly. If the transitional authority or interim government took it upon itself to draw up a new constitution, NACTU would resist and refuse to accept its legitimacy to do so. Having said this, the ILO should be prepared to give, at the appropriate time, a variety of much needed assistance. In particular, technical cooperation should be given to assist in the formation of a single employers' organisation in South Africa provided it would be non-racial, representative, and accepting of ILO standards, as well as the ILO Declaration on Action Against Apartheid. The ILO should also work to strengthen the labour movement both within the country and the subregion. Preparatory research and assistance could also be done outside of the country in consultation with the democratic trade unions in South Africa and the contemplated employers' organisation. Assistance should be given to the liberation movements to enable them to understand international labour standards and the framework of ILO operations. The ILO should also assist the trade union movement, government and employers in the front-line States to set up vocational training centres in southern Africa. Lastly, the issues raised by migrant labour should also be taken up by the ILO.

35. The observer of the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) stated that economic integration was currently a major preoccupation in Africa; this was particularly applicable to southern Africa, considering the weak national economies of the front-line States. The Pan-African Economic Community Treaty signed by African Heads of State in June 1991 provided a framework for region-wide integration and OATUU recently organised a seminar on trade unions' role in forging this integration.

As a first stage in the treaty's implementation, article 6 called for strengthening of existing subregional economic coordinating bodies and the formation of subregional economic communities where they do not already exist. A conclusion of the OATUU seminar emphasised that both regional and subregional integration structures should address the social dimensions of integration: a social clause should be included in the Community Treaty to guarantee worker and trade union rights. In this same context, the Conference background paper could well have expanded upon the social dimension of economic integration including the situation of workers during implementation of structural adjustment programmes; the ILO could increase assistance to trade unions addressing the effects of implementation of these programmes. National leaders should now ratify the Treaty and exhibit the political will needed to give it effect in subregional integration plans. OATUU believed that democracy and popular participation were essential for successful economic integration. The move towards democracy in South Africa is not yet conclusively irreversible as democracy did not yet exist there; as long as the movement was incomplete, the chances for economic integration would be threatened. Therefore, efforts to combat apartheid should be continued. OATUU condemned the arrest in Malawi of Chakufwa Chihana, SATUCC Executive Secretary, as it reflected a government attitude which threatened the democratic climate needed for integration. A complaint to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association was being considered.

36. The observer of the Pan-African Congress of Azania (PAC) considered that the Conference had been convened to carry out a mandate to "review the situation in South Africa with a view to providing up-to-date information to the International Labour Conference in 1992, and suggestions for further action to be taken in the light of the prevailing circumstances". PAC believed that in calling for the abandonment and lifting of sanctions the South African Government had made a mockery of the principles of negotiation. PAC did not consider CODESA to be genuine, representative negotiations. There was recently in Johannesburg a conference sponsored by the Konrad Adenauer Foundation under the auspices of a group called the Community Development Fund. The participants were to be the national liberation movements of South Africa plus the parties within CODESA; the objective was to determine how much progress had been made at CODESA. Of those within CODESA only the Democratic Party (DP) and the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) responded to the invitation; PAC and AZAPO represented those without. Of great interest was that both the DP and the IFP bemoaned the undemocratic way the de Klerk regime and some participants conducted the CODESA proceedings through the self-imposed principle of "sufficient consensus". The audience was informed that the de Klerk delegation, the National Party (NP) delegation, plus one or two other party delegations were the only ones whose consensus was always sufficient on any matter, even though there were 19 parties in CODESA. In other words even if 16 parties disagreed on a vital national issue, as long as the above three mentioned delegations agreed, their strength constituted "sufficient consensus"; there would be no further debate on the issue. The audience was shocked by these revelations and suggested that CODESA members should discuss these developments on public media such as television and radio; the DP representative agreed. It was also revealed at this meeting that a leaflet had been distributed by the NP – de Klerk's party – purporting to have the endorsement of CODESA. This leaflet was distributed prior to the "all-Whites referendum" and it said: "If you are afraid of majority rule vote YES on March 17." The DP speaker was shown this leaflet by AZAPO and asked whether as a participant in CODESA he endorsed his message. Needless to say many a White voter had voted YES and the majority of mankind believed South Africa was nearer to eradication of apartheid and the establishment of a democratic society under the repentent National Party of de Klerk. A PAC delegation of six, pursuant to its declared position to negotiate, met with de Klerk's Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Pik Botha, now leader of the NP in the Transvaal, at Abuja, Nigeria, in April 1992. The exploratory talks were fruitful and cordial. Both parties agreed to pursue them in the future. The meeting was facilitated by the President of Nigeria, current Chairman of the OAU. PAC believed that at no stage should any structure be mandated or entrusted with national responsibility or national decision-making responsibility before the entire nation has been given a chance through a vote to legitimise that structure. The conclusions of the Conference should bring to the attention of the International Labour Conference the false democracy of these negotiations, in hopes of bringing the parties, including PAC, and the Government back on to the path of a genuine representative negotiation process leading to peaceful resolution. In conclusion, PAC considered that it would be highly detrimental to the fight against apartheid to recommend that the ILO or any of the UN agencies should even contemplate at this or any other stage moving into South Africa before there is a government which is democratically elected and a constitution which enjoys the support of all the people.

37. The Government representative of Angola, speaking on the subject of subregional economic integration, noted that it had adopted a plan for socio-economic development which was closely linked to integration objectives, and observed that development of petroleum, chemical and transport resources would be a key factor in establishing integration. Angola was ready to cooperate with neighbouring governments in efforts to integrate economically. With this in mind the role of SADCC and PTA should be analysed with a view to using them to achieve more complete economic integration; the objectives and strategies of these organisations should be reoriented towards this goal. While the difficulties experienced by the people of southern Africa were common to lesser developed countries, those experienced here were worsened by two additional factors: the civil wars in Mozambique and Angola and the effects of apartheid on front-line States, as well as South Africa itself. Additionally, the economies in the subregion did not complement one another. These factors should be considered in any discussion of economic integration. It was hoped that integration would soon be a reality, in particular with respect to agriculture, transport and communications, energy and tourism; these sectors of economic activity should receive special attention.

38. The Employers' member of Pakistan expressed concern over the wide-ranging effects of the severe drought which had hit the subregion and hoped that timely, regionally coordinated action would avert catastrophe. Economic integration between States in the subregion presented many complexities, as the South African economy overshadowed all the rest. As had been previously pointed out, however, a post-apartheid South Africa would have its own difficulties in providing economic activities for its inhabitants; further dependence by neighbouring States might well not meet expectations. These States would therefore need support from the international community, including the ILO, to reach their goal of self-reliance. As regards the discussion on wages in the Conference background paper, it was feared that wage increases without corresponding productivity increases had led to economic difficulties. In a related area, ILO action in support of human resources development, education and training in the region was sorely needed. Specific action-oriented proposals in the Conference's conclusions would be welcomed.

39. The Government representative of Denmark addressed three subjects: recent developments in South Africa, subregional integration and the ILO's role in transitional and post-apartheid southern Africa. Although full confidence was placed in the CODESA process, the positive developments in South Africa could be noted only in the context of the continued threat posed by widespread violence there. Violence threatened the process and had to end; the international community had the right and the responsibility to try to remedy this situation. Concerning subregional integration, the existing arrangements (SADCC, PTA and SALC) could provide the basis for further integration. These arrangements could also be supplemented by bilateral agreements. The proposal presented at an OAU meeting in Kampala in May 1991 called "Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation in Africa" would probably be more susceptible to implementation at the subregional level. As regards the ILO, the Organisation had long been the spearhead against apartheid; it must maintain this position in the transitional and post-apartheid period. To do so, it should be able to work within South Africa. A decicion should be taken at the 1992 International Labour Conference as regards activities within South Africa if the ILO is to remain at the forefront of the battle against apartheid. Having heard the positions of COSATU and NACTU, it appeared that the Conference woud be able to provide appropriate conclusions in this regard to the Committee on Apartheid of the International Labour Conference. Lastly, the Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa did, indeed, need to be updated. A proposal to this effect was strongly supported.

40. The Employers' member of Botswana addressed the effects of political and economic developments in South Africa on the lesser developed States in the subregion. These effects included "brain drain" and a diversion of investments away from these States, as well as the effects of returning semi-skilled migrant labourers from South Africa. The ILO could play a role in addressing these effects at three levels. In the lesser developed countries, it could promote small-scale entrepreneurism, income and employment generating activities in rural areas, and human resource development, including basic skills programmes. In South Africa, the ILO could assist in building capacity in areas of management development, workers' education, industrial relations training for both management and labour, and promoting the ratification of labour Convention. At the subregional level, the ILO could assist in institution building, particularly in areas of management training, infrastructure capacity and material development, and the provision of technical expertise among local staff.

41. The observer from the Commonwealth Secretariat noted that the Commonwealth Heads of Government had met in the very same Conference Centre in Harare in October 1991, and had welcomed the progress towards the goal of a non-racial democracy in South Africa. At the meeting of Heads of Government, human resources development for a post-apartheid South Africa had been emphasised. The report adopted at that meeting stated that the legacy of apartheid would have to be dealt with, and that education and training of the deprived majority for key positions in the transition period was essential. People-to-people sanctions were lifted and a start should be made with training and placements within South Africa as well as continuing those without. The main target groups for the programme of human resource development included key civil servants, Black professionals in central and local government and in the private sector, trade unionists, teachers, educationalists, NGOs and community-based organisations and returning exiles. The importance of institution buildings was highlighted, as were programmes concerning youth, particularly through distance education and gender issues. The Commonwealth Secretariat was examining its training programme in the light of the above priorities and looked forward to future collaboration with the ILO in this regard. He pointed out that the SADCC Conference in Maputo had discussed post-apartheid South Africa and the SADCC region and the Commonwealth Secretariat continued to attach the highest priority to technical support to the SADCC countries. The Commonwealth Secretariat was in consultation with the United Nations about convening an international donors conference to consider assistance in the area of human resources development for a post-apartheid South Africa. Preparations for this conference were already under way.

42. The Workers' member of the Russian Federation, representing the General Confederation of Trade Unions, stated that he shared the assessment of the present situation in South Africa advanced by his colleagues in the Workers' group. It was with satisfaction that he acknowledge the progress towards a political settlement in South Africa. Particularly positive were the lifting of racist laws, the formation of CODESA and the results of the March referendum. Of concern, however, was the fact that the Conservative Party and a number of other radical organisations of the White community were not part of CODESA. He pointed out that the efforts of the international community for the abolition of apartheid had achieved appreciable results. A major contribution had been made through the application of economic sanctions, and he drew attention to the continued importance of the UN Security Council Resolution No. 417 regarding the embargo on nuclear technology and armaments until a new Constitution had been adopted and democratic elections held. It was with particular satisfaction that he noted the contribution of the ILO towards the abolition of racial oppression in South Africa. The ILO should continue to monitor developments in South Africa, and to ensure that the negative consequences of apartheid in labour relations were eliminated. He expressed solidarity with trade unions in South Africa and assured them of continued support and assistance.

43. The Government representative of Namibia expressed the hope that the discussions at the Conference would assist the ILO in finding ways to support effectively the positive changes taking place inside South Africa. However, he felt that there should be no relaxation of efforts to eradicate the apartheid system. He cautioned that the South African Government should not be praised without qualification for their attempts to bring about change. Instead, praise should go to those patriotic forces in the country relentlessly fighting for democracy. It was an illusion to think that the economic and social ills of the subregion would be cured when South Africa became a democracy, as post-apartheid South Africa would continue to be plagued by severe social and economic imbalances which would take a long time to eliminate. The economic problems of the region would only be solved if southern African States pooled their meagre resources. In the labour field they would have to do more to bring about the equitable distribution of wealth, and to implement the principles of equality and social justice. The situation of migrant workers would have to be reviewed immediately in order to find alternatives to employment in South Africa. This would involve job creation and wealth-generating programmes in the neighbouring States. Assistance could be sought from the ILO for studies of the informal sector in the region to enable southern African States to develop this rapidly growing sector as an alternative to formal wage employment. He added that southern Africa was rich in minerals, soils, human skills and labour, but had been unable to realise its potential because of the devastating impact of apartheid. With the prospect of that system being dismantled in favour of a non-racial democracy, the region might at last be in a position to tap its vast resources for the benefit of all its people. Noting the existence of SADCC, PTA and SACU, he suggested that their activities be reviewed in an effort to avoid the overlap and duplication of these regional economic organisations. In conclusion, he appealed for unity among the progressive forces in South Africa during the critical phase of constitutional negotiations.

44. The Government representative of Indonesia expressed satisfaction at the steps taken towards integration between the economies of southern Africa in order to uplift the people of the region. Asian countries shared a number of similarities with the countries of southern Africa, with large agricultural and informal sectors and low levels of human resources development. In the past decade, however, many Asian countries had seen high growth due to the selective choice of technology and a strong emphasis on human resources development. The informal sector remained central to those economies, however, and efforts had been made to improve its productivity and to promote small enterprise development. The ILO had provided assistance in this regard. Southern African States could learn from the Asian example, and South-South cooperation was important in this respect. He suggested that southern African States should cooperate to develop trade, both within the region and for the world market. The inclusion of South Africa would increase the potential of the regional market. In anticipation of South Africa's entry into the international community, the best use should be made of the ILO in developing training programmes; promoting human resources development; setting up labour market information systems; entrepreneur development programmes, including the informal sector; and study visits to other countries, including those in Asia.

45. The observer of the Organisation of African Unity (OUA) congratulated the ILO and the Governing Body for its efforts in combating apartheid, including the establishment of the Conference Committee on Action Against Apartheid, the Governing Body Committee on Discrimination and the Special Report of the Director-General on Action Against Apartheid. The assistance given to the national liberation movements and front-line States further reflected the ILO's commitment to the struggle against apartheid. Inaddition, the International Labour Conference had been the first organisation to invite Mr. Oliver Tambo and Mr. Nelson Mandela to address it. The OAU welcomed the changes taking place in South Africa and the Government's acceptance of the recent Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission. However, sanctions against South Africa should remain until a democratic government was in place. For the OAU, the fight against apartheid remained a major preoccupation. The OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government, the OAU Council of Ministers, and the OAU Labour Commission had permanent items on their agendas concerning apartheid. In this regard, he made special mention of the commitment of both the OATUU and Pan African Employers' Cônfederation. The OAU welcomed the idea of economic cooperation and integration in the southern African subregion as is believed that this was an essential first phase in the formation of an African Economic Community. The OAU proposed that future ILO activity should focus on vocational training and rehabilatation; workers' education; human resources development; labour legislation; the abolition of racial discrimination in employment; the extension of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act and the Unemployment Insurance Act to cover farmworkers, domestic workers and civil servants; assistance to the tripartite macro-economic negotiating forum; and the monitoring of the emplementation of labour laws. As for the action by the international community he appealed to it to continue implementing the United Nations sanctions, arms and oil embargo and to put pressure on the South African Government until a complete eradication of apartheid has become a reality. He added that the international community should spare no effort to lend its assistance to the reform process taking place in South Africa, and give its material and moral support to the people of South Africa.

46. The Employers' member of the Netherlands read out the following conclusions proposed by the Employers' group which were being submitted for consideration by the Working Party:

(1) Technical assistance

The meeting recommends that the International Labour Conference take the following decision at its 79th Session: the ILO should, in line with other UN agencies, prepare projects for technical assistance to South African employers' and workers' organisations. For this purpose ILO experts should meet with representatives of these organisations in South Africa and consult with them on the nature and content of proposed projects. Such projects could then be implemented after the creation of an interim government.

(2) ILO Declaration

The meeting consideres that it is premature to denounce or revise the ILO Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid. The meeting expresses the wish that future developments in South Africa will in due time make the content of the Declaration obsolete.

(3) South African employers' organisations

The meeting notes with satisfaction that the IOE, PEC and their members have undertaken the effort – in line with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the ILO annual Conference – to convene a meeting with the South African employers' organisations, FABCOS, NAFCOC, SACCOLA. At a meeting which took place in Harare in January 1992, FABCOS, NAFCOC and SACCOLA "expressed their agreement on the principle of the creation of a unified and representative non-racial umbrella employers' organisation in South Africa able to represent and defend the common interests of its constituents while preserving their specificity and identity". The meeting expresses the wish that the creation of such an organisation will pave the way for the inclusion of South African employers into the IOE and ILO.

(4) Regional cooperation

The meeting expresses the wish that – in line with further political developments in South Africa – the integration of South Africa in SADCC, PTA, SALC will be favourably considered by governments of the countries in the southern African region. An economic and social balance is of great importance to employers and workers in this subregion.

(5) ILO Declaration on multinational enterprises

The meeting urges employers' and workers' organisations and multinational and national enterprises operating in southern Africa to observe the principles embodied in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. In this respect particular attention is drawn to the provisions in the Declaration on employment, training, equality of opportunity and treatment, conditions of work and life, safety and health, freedom of association and the right to organise and collective bargaining.

(6) South African labour legislation and tripartite body: Investment

The meeting strongly urges the actors in the labour field in South Africa to extend appropriate labour legislation to domestic and farmworkers. This legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down in ILO instruments. It regrets that the National Manpower Committee is at present not able to function in a proper way. The meeting recommends that the creation in South Africa of a tripartite economic and social body should be seriously and expeditiously considered. The meeting urges the full implementation of the conclusions and recommendations as laid down in the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission after its visit in February 1992 to South Africa. It is advised that in this tripartite body a debate can be held on an investment code for South Africa by South Africans.

(7) Convention No. 111 – Action against discrimination

The meeting strongly urges full implementation in South Africa of the principles laid down in ILO Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The removal of all discrimination is of particular interest to the further development of a non-racial South Africa.

47. The observer of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) recognised that southern Africa was going through a period of profound changes. Several countries were taking steps to democratise their societies and the negotiations currently taking place in South Africa were part of these changes. Respect for human and trade union rights remained an essential prerequisite for these changes. In this connection, the continued violation of trade union rights and failure to extend these rights to large sectors of the workforce – farm, domestic and public sector workers – should be condemned. All working people should fully enjoy the right to participate in the determination of their working conditions as well as in the social and political life of their countries. He condemned the Government of Malawi for arresting and detaining Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary General of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council (SATUCC) for his call to the Malawi authorities to bring about the necessary reforms for establishing a democratic government in the country. The ICFTU could not accept that violation of freedom of association be considered simply as an internal matter. He therefore called on the Malawi authorities to release Chihana and any other member of SATUCC's staff who might be imprisoned and to authorise the reopening of SATUCC's offices in Lilongwe, so that this organisation could resume its normal work. In this regard, he was pleased to note the statements of the representativeds of COSATU and NACTU and appealed to all trade unions to demonstrate their solidarity with their imprisoned comrades in Malawi. He thanked the ILO for having addressed a letter to the Government demanding their release. He also indicated that the ICFTU had submitted a complaint on this matter to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association. The ICFTU, which had always been in the forefront of the fight against apartheid, observed that much remained to be done before a non-racial and democratic South Africa was created. In his statement to the Conference, the Secretary-General of COSATU had indicated that the South Africa region continued to use violence to destabilise the Black majority and refused to extend labour legislation to certain sectors of the workforce. It was seeking international recognition while it continued to undermine tripartite mechanisms and to take unilateral initiatives for restructuring the economy. The Secretary General of NACTU had pointed out that the Government talked of negotiations while it was preparing taxation proposals which would weigh heavily on the poor. It was therefore obvious that the Government had no intention of transferring power to the majority; on the contrary, it sought to maintain the status quo. The ICFTU therefore intended to continue its efforts to exercise maximum pressure, so as to bring about a genuinely democratic system of government. Over the years the South African trade union movement had grown not only in size, but also in influence. It had been able to take various important initiatives for the develpment of social and economic policies. The ICFTU had followed with particular interest the campaign which it had conducted for the abolition of apartheid laws. It had used its influence on the shopfloor to negotiate with employers and to bring in the Government only when both parties had reached an agreement. One of the most important of these initiatives was the negotiation which had taken place between SACCOLA, the employers' organisation, COSATU and NACTU on the Labour Relations Act which resulted in a new Act being brought before the South African Parliament. The restructuring of the clothing and textile industries was also an initiative of the trade union in this sector, and this made it possible to start developing policies which would improve the competitiveness of the sector. At its congress in Caracas, Venezuela, the ICFTU had discussed the issues of South Africa at length and it renewed its commitment to support, within the framework of its Coordinating Committee for Southern Africa, the democratic trade unions of South Africa until a democratic government, founded on the principle of "one man one vote", had been established. The ICFTU congress in Caracas had also recognised the extreme inequalities which existed in South Africa, especially in the form of racial discrimination and the exploitation of communities. He appealed to the international community to give priority to education training. The congress had also called for the adoption of a code of practice on foreign companies investing in South Africa, and this code should be based on international labour standards and include measures to encourage companies to accelerate the pace of change in the sphere of education and training and to promote the implementation of such a code through direct discussions with multinational corporations and national governments. The ICFTU intended to take urgent measures to implement the resolution made by its Congress. On 23 April the ICFTU Coordinating Committee on Southern Africa had decided to work closely with democratic trade unions in drafting a code of conduct for multinationals operating in South Africa. Measures should also be taken to support all initiatives aimed at assisting African trade unions in the fields of education, training and the respect for human rights. The Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Committee had a major role to play in this area. As regards the ILO, this Organisation was a true home for those seeking freedom and democraty and its action had greatly contribued to alleviating the suffering of people in the region. He joined the representatives of NACTU and COSATU in requesting that the ILO did not begin operations in South Africa until after the establishment of an interim government.

48. The Government representative of Egypt expressed the hope that the Conference would mark the last mile in the struggle to make South Africa a free, non-racial and democratic society. While a great deal had been achieved in the struggle, much remained to be done to eliminate the system in practical terms, to anticipate the needs of a new South Africa and to assist the country in confronting the aftermath of apartheid. In this regard, he associated himself with the conclusion made by the ILO in the report on economic integration in southern Africa according to which the challenge facing the social partners was to ensure that the forthcoming changes would be for the good of all concerned, to promote economic growth with equity and to establish a solid basis for democracy and human rights. In this regard, he could not but commend the ILO's activities in the southern African region, in particular in South Africa itself. He emphasised the need for the ILO to continue and consolidate its action, taking into account the needs of the South African people. There was no doubt that the ILO's action, based on the Organisation's own standards, other international standards and those of the OAU, would continue to assist national liberation movements and workers in South Africa and all others who were struggling to build a new society. His Government fully concurred with the Employers' member of Botswana and the Government member of Indonesia as regards the areas in which the ILO should consolidate its activities. Turning to economic integration in southern Africa, he stated that such integration would no doubt be beneficial to the ILO's efforts to build a post-apartheid South Africa and foster integration throughout Africa. This matter should be addressed with great caution. As the Workers' member from Finland had stated, the approach to the problem of economic integration should not be based solely on economic considerations, but should be placed within the context of full respect for civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights. In this connection, he referred to two basic texts. First, the African Charter on Human and People's Rights which was adopted by the OAU in 1981 and which had come into force in 1986. This Charter referred, inter alia, to the rights of every individual to work in equitable and satisfactory conditions as well as to the principle of equal pay for equal work. The Charter also referred to other human rights such as freedom of association, freedom of assembly, the right of people to economic, social and cultural development, with due regard to their identity. The second document was the Declaration adopted by the Heads of State and Government of the OAU in 1990 concerning the economic situation in Africa. The Declaration underlined the gravity of the situation in Africa; for the continent to effect the required social and economic change to achieve economic integration, it was necessary to establish social and political democracy, based on the respect for human rights and the rule of law. In conclusion, he stated that the Conference should make a strong appeal to the international community to help the countries in southern Africa in their efforts to execute structural adjustment programmes and to counter the negative impact of these programmes on their development. The Conference was no doubt aware of the negative effects which failure by the international community to confront these issues in southern Africa might have. As in the past, his Government was ready to join with others to contribute to African and international efforts to eradicate apartheid, to ensure a successful transition to democracy in South Africa, and to achieve economic integration not only in southern Africa, but on the continent as a whole.

49. The Government representative of the United Republic of Tanzania emphasied that the Conference was taking place at an opportune time. The countries of southern Africa had experienced the scourge of apartheid for decades, but the days when these countries were terrorised by the racist governments that had succeeded one another in South Africa were numbered. The United Republic of Tanzania and other States of the subregion were ready to welcome a new partner in their regional bodies. The abolition of apartheid could give birth to a new democratic South Africa which, given its GDP and population, could overshadow the entire region. Being the greatest absorber of migrant labour in the region, South Africa would undoubtedly seek new solutions for its problems of unemployment and employment. It was therefore important to seek, at regional level, harmonisation of legislation in the fields of employment, labour relations, migration, industrial policy and investment codes, etc. Cooperation with a democratic South Africa could help to avoid the danger that South Africa's producers would dominate their competitors in neighbouring countries. In other words, economic integration was inevitable once apartheid was entirely abolished. The challenge facing the social partners would be to ensure that the changes taking place were for the good of all, that they promoted economic growth and social justice and provided a solid basis for democracy and human rights. Howewer, the time had not yet come to court South Africa. In keeping with its long-standing position, and as it had stated before the ad-hoc committee at the recent OAU Conference held in Arusha, the United Republic of Tanzania, his Government was in favour of maintaining sanctions as long as apartheid was not totally eradicated. While the de Klerk Government should be congratulated for its efforts, these were not yet sufficient. Following the referendum in which the White minority had endorsed the negotiation process, it was clear that apartheid was doomed. Yet, the mere fact that the referendum was reserved for Whites only proved that apartheid was still very much alive. The international community should refrain from lifting sanctions because of the scant progress achieved. This only delayed the negotiation process and added to the suffering of the people of South Africa and of the entire region.

50. The Workers' member if Sri Lanka was encouraged by the developments in South Africa. The role played by the country's independent trade union movement in redressing the injustices perpetrated had been positive and the movement should continue efforts to involve itself in economic restructuring. As regards activities within South Africa, the ILO should not change its strategy in providing technical assistance as long as the racist government was in control, although the situation should be closely monitored Concerning economic integration, the trade union movement should play an important role if it was to succeed; governments not yet convinced of this should reconsider their position. The Conference should call for the social partners' full involvement in subregional and national planning as their participation was an absolute prerequisite for success. With respect to technical assistance, ILO support to trade unions organising rural and agricultural workers should be strengthened, ratification of the Rural Workers' Convention, 1975 (No. 141), should be promoted. Assistance should also be aimed at eliminating discrimination affecting, women and youth. Lastly, a call was made for implementation through national legislation of the Social Charter recently adopted by SALC in this regard. ILO assistance should be made available where it would be useful.

51. The Workers' member of Guinea observed that, as the world was democratising, so was South Africa: change to date was, however, neither complete nor sufficient. The fight against apartheid should not stop with a half-victory. The ILO was called upon to develop research activities in all areas in which it is competent in order to assure that related problems are properly addressed in the post-apartheid period. Workers' education in modern trade union techniques would also be useful. Lastly, until it was appropriate for the ILO to provide assistance in South Africa, it should maintain its readiness to do so.

52. The Government representative of Zimbabwe welcomed the timing of the Confrence as it was being held amidst historic changes; its convening reflected the ILO's confidence in the early demise of apartheid and its desire to ensure that benefical effects arose from post-apartheid subregional integration. The Conference gave the ILO an opportunity to review its programme of action in response to the new situation in the subregion. Despite encourging developments in South Africa, full political rights had yet to be extended to all. Full tripartism did not exist, and not all industrial organisations were independent, democratic and non-racial. Therefore, sanctions should be lifted only as agreed upon by the international community. It would be premature for the ILO to establish either formal relations with the southern African regime or its presence in South Africa before the setting up of an interim government entrusted with supervising the transition to democratic rule. As regards economic integration, existing institutions might well be rationalised, taking new imperatives into consideration. Consultations were under way in this regard. The ILO's assistance could be designed to facilitate harmonisation of policies and programmes in the subregion relating to human resources development, employment, labour mobility and labour conditions with a view to promoting economic development and genuine integration.

53. The observer of the Southern African Trade Union Coordinating Council (SATUCC), who was also Worker member from Zambia, welcomed the recent adoption by SALC of the Social Charter and urged that the social partners take action to implement its provisions, as violations of human rights, whether by South Africa or by any independent and democratic Black government in the region could not be tolerated. The detention of Chalufwa Chihana and other members of the SATUCC staff, and the closure of SATUCC offices by the Government of Malawi should be condemned by this Conference. A mission visiting Malawi from 26 to 29 April 1992 was disappointed at not having been given the opportunity to meet with senior government authorities in order to obtain an explanation of the Government's actions; the mission had also been denied access to jailed colleagues. SATUCC sadly noted that the detentions took place hardly two weeks after Malawi had participated in the adoption of the SALC Social Charter. Economic integration could not be achieved without freedom and meaningful participation of free and independant trade unions. SATUCC recommended that the Conference strongly condemn the Malawi Government for its primitive actions against democracy and that the ILO, the governments and all organisations represented at the Conference put pressure on the Malawi Government to release SATUCC officials, reopen SATUCC offices and provide full freedom and political pluralism.

54. The Workers' member of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions considered that the subregion was in a state of crisis; unemployment was widespread, physical and social infrastructure including schools, hospitals and roads were deteriorating; economies were declining; and the subregion was suffering severe drought. Although there were many reasons for these problems, the failure of tripartite institutions to empower the people was the primary cause. While the process of change in South Africa brought prospects for a better future, observers should remain on guard until change was complete. International organisations would play a major contribution to social transformation in the subregion; the ILO would play an important role in South Africa when the time was right. Urgent measures needed to be taken in the areas of human resources development, including technical, vocational, numeracy and literacy training. Employment centres were also needed. Lastly, international organisations should be asked to be ready to respond to future requests for support from trade union movements in training and skills upgrading in the fields of collective bargaining processes and health and safety matters.

55. The observer of the World Federation of Trade Unions stated that many changes had occurred since the last International Labour Conference, both in South Africa and at the international level, in respect of developments in the southern African subregion. The main task of the Conference was to agree on fields of future ILO involvement in the subregion. ILO involvement would be appropriate in the following areas: rebuilding and restructuring of the subregion's socio-economic system; developing employment; harmonising of industrial relations practices and labour law; assisting democratic worker and employer organisation; addressing the problems of migrant labour; promoting occupational safety and health; and providing workers' education. Finally, the ILO should prepare for distribution to the International Labour Conference a supplement to the Special Report of the Director-General concerning Application of the Declaration on Action Against Apartheid providing information on the most recent developments in the subregion, including the conclusions of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission which recently visited South Africa to investigate a complaint made by COSATU concerning infringement of freedom of association principles.

56. The observer of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) recalled the role played by the ECA in the formation and functioning of certain regional and subregional bodies, including SALC, and pledged continued technical support. With regard to assistance to post-apartheid South Africa, ECA was discussing with the liberation movements specific areas where its technical support could be provided. Economic integration, based on the Lagos Plan of Action, the Treaty establishing the African Economic Community and development of subregional communities, was considered vital. Eastern and southern African structures, including PTA, SADCC, IGADD and IOC, could form the basis for subregional integration; decisions to rationalise the activities of these groups were welcomed. In this same vein, a recent meeting of Ministers of Economic Planning requested the ECA to work more closely with the OAU and ADB to accelerate the pace of regional economic integration; to this end, ECA activities, including a subregional conference on the subject, were being contemplated for elaborating a programme of action.

57. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom raised two points and asked that they be included in the conclusions of the Conference. First, a recommendation should be made that all workers in all areas of South Africa be covered by protective labour legislation and be granted full rights of association. Second, the ILO should consider taking action to help match retrenched public servants with employment and retraining opportunities, and that special efforts be made to strengthen possibilities of management training for this particular group of skilled and talented workers.

58. The Government representative of Botswana, noting the positive developments in the subregion, warned the Conference participants not to be too optimistic in regarding the democratisation process. As concerns guidelines for future ILO action in the subregion, the followinbg points should be noted: the ILO should concentrate efforts on human resources development, especially in the field of technical and vocational education with special reference to Black youth in South Africa; employers should be encouraged to train for their own market needs; regional institutions should be used as a basis for subregional economic integration; and the ILO should consider giving assistance in the creation of national productivity centres designed to promote sustainable development by reinforcing the work ethic.

59. At the close of the general debate the Secretary-General of the Conference stated that the Working Party would consider the many suggestions that had been made in the course of the debate. Both the Workers' and Employers' groups had submitted draft conclusions to be considered by the Working Party, and the opinions of organisations inside South Africa had also been heard. He therefore felt that it was possible to suggest new ways of addressing the situation in South Africa and in the subregion. Mr. Maier noted that the view had been expressed that the ILO should wait until agreement had been reached on transitional or interim arrangements before providing the full range of assistance within South Africa. It had also been stated in the Conference that it might be necessary for the International Labour Conference to examine the relevance of the Declaration on Action Against Apartheid. For procedural and constitutional reasons, this could not be done before 1993. In the meantime, the ILO should continue its action in the same way as the UN had done through its Resolution 46/79A. Mr. Maier pointed out that the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission would be finalised this week and would provide guidance on matters relating to industrial relations in South Africa. Indeed, it was evident that there was a need to achieve a greater degree of harmonisation in labour laws and social conditions throughout the region. Similarly, there was a need to address the social dimensions of the process of economic development and structural change in the context of regional integration. It was the mandate and the responsibility of the ILO to provide technical assistance to the subregion in employment promotion, labour market issues, reabsorption of returning migrants, promotion of tripartism, human resources development and the achievement of equality of opportunity and treatment, irrespective of race or sex.

Conclusions

60. The Working Party appointed by the Conference met on the penultimate day of the Conference for the purpose of drafting conclusions to be placed before the Conference for adoption.

61. In presenting the proposed conclusions on behalf of the Working Party, the Reporter, Mr. Pedersen, clarified with respect to recommendation No. 25 that certain prerequisites for action by the ILO were contained therein. These were that the organisations to be assisted should be non-racial, democratic and willing to accept international labour standards; that the ILO should conduct consultations with workers and employers on the nature and content of proposed projects to be undertaken in South Africa and once the green light had been given, consultations could take place anywhere; and that such projects would only be implemented after the creation of an interim government.

62. The Conference proceeded to adopt the following conclusions proposed by the Working Party:

Social, economic and labour aspects of subregional integration in post-apartheid southern Africa

(1) Good relations should prevail between all States in the subregion, founded on the principle of mutual respect between sovereign States. The Conference calls on the South African Government to refrain from any actions which harm stability in the southern African subregion.

(2) In southern Africa, priority should be given to supporting efforts aimed at balanced policies for economic and social growth, social justice, and basic human and trade union rights in all the countries, to the benefit of the whole region.

(3) The Conference expresses the hope that – in line with further positive political developments in South Africa – the integration of South Africa in SADCC, PTA, and SALC will be favourably considered by governments of the countries in the subregion, in cooperation with Employers' and Workers' organisations.

(4) The Conference notes with appreciation the work of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council and calls on governments, of the subregion to implement fully the social charter of workers' rights adopted recently by the Southern African Labour Commission (SALC) in Lusaka, Zambia.

(5) The following areas should be covered by the ILO Programme of Action in southern Africa: (i) job creation; (ii) promotion of small business and cooperatives; (iii) vocational education, training and retraining; (iv) improvement of labour laws and upgrading of labour standards; (v) promotion of equality of opportunity; (vi) improving working and living conditions and organisation of rural workers; (vii) occupational health and safety; (viii) migration of labour.

(6) The ILO should continue to support assistance to migrant workers in southern Africa and provide more resources to technical and vocational training and the creation of employment opportunities for returning migrant workers. Such programmes should be conducted in conjunction with trade union organisations of the subregion and particularly through the coordination and cooperation of the Southern African Trade Union Coordination Council. The governments in the subregion should also give immediate priority to the initiation of specific programmes providing job opportunities for migrant workers and provide for regular consultation and collaboration with workers' and employers' organisations in the formulation and implementation of policies affecting migrant workers.

(7) The ILO should effectively assist the countries in the subregion in setting up adequate mechanisms for social and economic dialogue; for constructive industrial relations, and for tripartite consultation and cooperation. They are essential pillars in the building up of national infrastructure, which is indispensable for the preparation and implementation of economic and social programmes.

(8) The ILO should play its full role with the international financial institutions as well as with the national governments in the subregion, to make sure that the concerns of workers and employers are effectively taken into account and that their organisations are involved when programmes and policies for structural adjustment are planned and implemented.

(9) The Conference urges governments, employers' and workers' organisations and multinational and national enterprises operating in southern Africa to observe the principles embodied in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy. In this respect, particular attention is drawn to the provisions in the Declaration on employment, training, equality of opportunity and treatment, conditions of work and life, safety and health, freedom of association and the right to organise and collective bargaining.

Recent development concerning apartheid in South Africa

(10) The Conference considers that it is premature to repeal or revise the ILO Declaration concerning Action Against Apartheid in South Africa. It expresses the hope that future developments in South Africa will, in due time, make the content of the Declaration obsolete.

(11) Sanctions should be maintained on South Africa to speed up the process of change, in line with the decisions of the United Nations.

(12) The ILO should continue to support the democratic trade unions' struggle to extend basic trade union rights to all workers in South Africa. Particular attention should be given to farm, domestic, public sector workers and those in bantustans who continue to be denied basic trade union rights.

(13) The ILO should continue to support the efforts of the democratic trade unions to ensure that basic human and trade union rights, such as the right of workers to belong to trade unions, trade union independence from government, employers and political parties, the right to resort to strike action, freedom of association and expression, are entrenched in a new South African Constitution and should urge the Government of South Africa and all political groups to respond positively to this demand.

(14) The Conference strongly urges full implementation in South Africa of the principles laid down in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The removal of all discrimination and the promotion of equality are of particular interest to the further development of a non-racial South Africa.

(15) The Conference notes with appreciation that the IOE, PEC and their members have undertaken the effort – in line with the conclusions of the 78th Session of the ILO annual Conference – to convene a meeting with the South African employers' organisations, i.e. FABCOS, NAFCOC, SACCOLA. At a meeting which took place in Harare in January 1992, FABCOS, NAFCOC and SACCOLA "expressed their agreement on the principle of the creation of a unified and representative non-racial umbrella employers' organisation in South Africa able to represent and defend the common interests of its constituents while preserving their specificity and identity". The Conference expresses the hope that the creation of such an organisation will pave the way for the inclusion of South African employers into the ILO, once South Africa becomes a member State of the ILO.

(16) The Conference stresses the importance of education and training so that the transition process can lead to improved working and living conditions, equality and social stability. In particular, the Black population should be able to occupy positions crucial to the building of non-racial democratic institutions throughout society. They must be equipped with the skills needed for an expanding economy, which should include basic literacy education, technical and vocational training and retraining.

(17) Employers and employers' organisations are requested to provide adequate in-house training in order to upgrade the skills of workers.

(18) The democratic trade unions have an important role to play in this area and have to be involved at the planning and implementation stages.

(19) Assistance programmes on workers' education should be expanded and adapted to the needs of the transition and post-apartheid period. Maximum support should be given to the non-racial democratic trade union movement through ILO Workers' Education Activities. Assistance programmes should also be developed for non-racial, democratic employers' organisations.

(20) The Conference strongly urges that measures should be taken to ensure that domestic and farmworkers and workers in the public sector are covered by labour legislation. This legislation should be in accordance with the principles laid down in ILO instruments.

(21) The Conference regrets that the National Manpower Commission is at present not able to function in a proper way.

(22) The Conference recommends that the creation in South Africa of a tripartite economic and social body should be seriously and expeditiously considered.

(23) The Conference recommends that in this tripartite body negotiations be held on an investment code for South Africa, which could be part of a broader economic and social programme.

(24) The Conference deplores the practice whereby the South African Government recruits skilled and semi-skilled workers, particularly from Eastern Europe and Hong Kong, as well as the preferential treatment and job opportunities given by employers to White immigrant workers even in circumstances where local workers are qualified and available or could be readily trained; in addition, immigrant workers are paid more than local workers, the latter being subjected to strict tests when applying for jobs. The Conference recalls the conclusion adopted in this regard by the International Labour Conference at its 78th Session (1991) (paragraph 64(i)) of the report of the Conference Committee on Action Against Apartheid.

(25) The Conference recommends that the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1992) take the following decision:

> The ILO should – in line with other UN agencies – prepare projects for technical assistance to South African employers' and workers' organisations, on the understanding > that these organisations are non-racial, democratic and are willing to accept international labour standards. For this purpose the ILO should, in accordance with the usual procedure for consultation with workers and employers, respectively, meet with representatives of these organisations and consult with them on the nature and content of proposed projects in South Africa. Such projects could then be implemented after the creation of an interim government.

63. The Conference also agreed to transmit a message to His Excellency the President of Malawi, the text of which appears in Appendix III.

64. At its final sitting, the Conference also unanimously adopted the draft text of its report, subject to a number of editorial corrections. A reservation to conclusion No. 10 was entered by the Government member of the United States, and to conclusion No. 11 by the Employers' group.

65. The Employers' Vice-President and the Workers' Vice-President both delivered brief closing addresses. The Workers' Vice-President brought to the attention of delegates the main points of her meeting in Johannesburg on the previous day with Mr. Nelson Mandela, President of the African National Congress. Mr. Mandela had confirmed his wish to see the ILO Declaration retained, and United Nations sanctions maintained. Mr. Mandela encouraged the creation of a non-racial employers' association, and recommended that no ILO office be established in South Africa before the creation of an interim government and a request from the ANC to that effect. Mr. Mandela also convoyed his appreciation for the work of the Conference Committee on Action Against Apartheid.

66. The Assistant Director-General for Africa thanked the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Presidents, the President, Mr. Nkomo, His Excellency Mr. Robert Mugabe, and the secretariat for their contributions to the success of the Conference.

67. In his closing address, the President touched on a number of the conclusions which recommended that the ILO embark on the preparatory work of technical assistance projects; facilitate the setting up of tripartite decision-making structures; promote the adoption and implementation of labour standards; and assist in furthering the aims of mutual economic cooperation and balance regional integration for the benefit of all the countries in the region. He expressed the hope that this, the fourth in the series of ILO Tripartite Conferences concerning Apartheid in Southern Africa, would be the last. The days of apartheid were numbered and the ILO had taken timely action to define a programme of action that would contribute to the establishment of a non-racial and democratic South Africa.

Harare, 8 May 1992.

President.

APPENDIX I

Opening address by His Excellency the President, Comrade R. G. Mugabe, on the occasion of the ILO Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa at the Harare International Conference Centre on 6 May 1992

Mr. Chairman, the ILO Director-General, members of the ILO Governing Body, members of the Diplomatic Corps, Honourable Ministers, distinguished delegates, invited guests, ladies and gentlemen.

On behalf of the Government and people of Zimbabwe, and on my own behalf, it gives me great pleasure to welcome you to Harare, and to this International Labour Organisation Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, whose main objective is to assess developments concerning apartheid in South Africa, as well as to reflect on the post-apartheid situation in the southern African subregion. We extend to you a hearty welcome and wish you all an enjoyable and fruitful stay in our country.

It is noted that this is the fourth occasion during the last 11 years that an ILO Conference of this nature has been held in southern Africa. At all occasions the objective has been to assess the progress made towards the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa and to recommend appropriate actions to this effect. On all previous occasions in 1981, 1984 and 1988, the Conference was held in an atmosphere of despair and anguish as the apartheid system in South Africa became more entrenched, more violent and more destructive on its victims. At all those occasions the Conference condemned the system of apartheid in the strongest of terms and recommended actions designed to undermine the policy and practice of apartheid.

Apartheid has long been condemned as a crime against humanity and a threat to international peace and stability. Apartheid manifested itself in every walk of life, in labour matters as well as in political, economic and social fields. The system of apartheid has had several negative effects including turning South Africans into refugees in front-line and neighbouring States, disrupting family life, inflaming racial hatred and moulding a mood of violence, and extreme impoverishment of the Black population. Outside South Africa, acts of aggression, sabotage and destabilisation have been perpetrated against neighbouring States, causing untold human suffering and damage worth millions of dollars with the intention to undermine the support for struggle by the oppressed people of South Africa. Thus, the policy of apartheid directly exerted a negative influence on the priorities of the subregion as neighbouring States were compelled to spend significant proportions of their budgets on defence in order to counter South Africa's destabilisation programme.

However, on the occasion of this Conference, there is a feeling of hope and optimism that the days of apartheid are numbered. This optimism has been kindled by the positive developments that have taken place in South Africa in the last few months. We have seen the start of the dismantlement of the system of apartheid, through the repeal of its legal pillars that include the Group Areas Act, the Population Registration Act and the Land Acts.

We have witnessed the release of political prisoners, the lifting of the ban on political organisations and the return of political exiles. We have also been encouraged by the establishment of CODESA as a forum to facilitate the process of negotiation and political reform. More recently, the results on the 17 March referendum have clearly revealed that Whites are ready to commit themselves to political reform through dialogue with the majority Black population.

Mr. Chairman, we are, however, deeply distressed at the escalating violence and daily loss of innocent lives in South Africa, especially in the Black townships. We believe that any divide-and-rule tactics at this juncture are dangerous and can only plunge the country into chaos from which no one will benefit. We are therefore concerned at the lack of common purpose and unity among the opposition forces at this critical moment in the struggle against apartheid, when these forces should be providing each other support in the negotiations with the White regime. We urge them to pursue this objective with vigour. In spite of the setbacks and negative developments, we remain optimistic that a democratic order will eventually emerge in South Africa. We call upon the international community to continue to play an active role in the dismantling of apartheid by giving guidance and encouragement to the democratisation process in South Africa.

We must commend the International Labour Organisation for playing its part in the struggle against apartheid. Through the Declaration concerning the policy of apartheid initially adopted in 1964 and subsequently updated in 1981, 1984 and 1988, not only has the ILO condemned apartheid in the strongest terms, but it has also urged and taken concrete measures through its constituent members to fight against this evil system. The actions taken have been aimed not only at undermining the system of apartheid itself, but also at providing support and assistance to the victims of apartheid, both inside and outside South Africa. Training and other technical services have been provided to the liberation movements, the Black workers and their independent trade unions. Neighbouring States have been provided with assistance to enable them to provide facilities for refugees from South Africa and Namibia at institutions of their own through the provision of equipment, expertise and fellowships. The ILO has continued to monitor and compile reports of labour and social conditions in South Africa which have provided valuable information to its members and the international community.

This Conference therefore signifies the continued solidarity of the ILO with the peoples of South Africa who over the years have borne the brunt of the violence of apartheid. Economic development needs a stable international, regional and national environment. For us in Africa, the external environment has been most unfavourable and even quite hostile. We have experienced drastic increases in oil prices in the 1970s. We have also witnessed the collapse of commodity prices, unequal terms of trade and increased protection against the exports of developing countries and steep rises in interest rates at world financial markets in the 1980s. There seems little to cheer about in the 1990s. At the regional level, efforts are under way to establish an Economic African Community as a continental framework for the development, mobilisation and utilisation of human and material resources of Africa in order to promote trade and socio-economic development on a self-reliant and indigenous basis. However, the regional approach needs to be complemented by economic building blocks at the subregional level.

Mr. Chairman, the discussions and conclusions of your Conference should enable the ILO to adopt an appropriate posture towards South Africa and to formulate a programme of action that will strengthen, facilitate and consolidate the process of reform, and progressively improve the social and labour conditions for the Black population in that country.

In conclusion, I would like to express our gratitude to the ILO for organising this Conference in Harare. This event signifies the ILO's solidarity with the people of southern Africa. On our part we affirm our conviction in the aims and objectives of the ILO. Zimbabwe is ready to shoulder its responsibilities in the Organisation, and the struggle against apartheid.

With these remarks, it is now my pleasure to declare the Conference open. Thank you.

APPENDIX III

Appeal to His Excellency Dr. K. H. Banda, President of the Republic of Malawi

The Tripartite Conference of the International Labour Organisation on Southern Africa, meeting in Harare, Zimbabwe, on 5 to 8 May 1992, is gravely concerned about the recent developments in Malawi. The Conference deeply regrets the violence exercised by the security forces against peaceful demonstrators resulting in the killing and injuring of many people. The Conference is also deeply shocked to lean of the arrest and detention of Chakufwa Chihana, Secretary-General of SATUCC and of the arrest of SATUCC staff members, and the closure of SATUCC offices in Lilongwe. These are gross violations of fundamental human and trade union rights and the Conference demands the immediate release of Chakufwa Chihana and his colleagues and for SATUCC offices to be reopened.

The Conference also calls upon your Government to honour its commitments to respect human and trade union rights guaranteed under the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Charter of the United Nations, of both of which Malawi is a Member.

Harare, 8 May 1992.

President of the Conference

5. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 79th (June 1992) Session for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides:

(a) to amend article III, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation to read as follows:

> The Tribunal shall consist of [three judges and four deputy] seven judges, who shall all be of different nationalities;

(b) to delete the words "and deputy judges" from article III, paragraph 2;

(c) to amend article III, paragraph 4, as follows:

> A meeting of the Tribunal shall be composed of three members [, of whom one at least must be a judge] or, in exceptional cases, five, or seven, to be designated by the President.

(d) to delete (as being no longer relevant) article III, paragraph 3, of the Statute which reads as follows:

> The terms of office of the judges and deputy judges who were in office on 1 January 1940 are prolonged until 1 April 1947 and thereafter until otherwise decided by the appropriate organ of the International Labour Organisation. Any vacancy which occurs during the period in question shall be filled by the said organ.

B. Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

6. Appendix III contains an extract from the Second Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd (May-June 1992) Session.

FOR DECISION

7. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 79th (June 1992) Session for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides to appoint as judge of the Administrative Tribunal, for a term of three years, with effect from 18 November 1992:

Mr. Michel Gentot (France),

Decides to appoint as judge of the Administrative Tribunal, for a term of three years and with immediate effect:

Mr. Mark Fernando (Sri Lanka),

Decides to extend the term of office of Mr. Pierre Pescatore by a further period of three years,

Declares that, as from the adoption by the Conference of the proposed amendment to article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal repealing the distinction between judges and deputy judges, all deputy judges in office will be considered as judges for the remaining part of their term of office.

C. ASSESSMENT OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA AND VIET NAM

Republic of Korea

8. Appendix IV contains an extract from the report of the Allocations Committee to the Governing Body at its 252nd Session (February-March 1992).

FOR DECISION

9. On the recommendation of its Allocations Committee, the Governing Body decided on 5 March 1992 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for the period of its membership in 1991 an annual assessment rate of 0.68 per cent for the contribution of the Republic of Korea to the 1990-91 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation;

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for 1992 an annual assessment rate of 0.68 per cent for the contribution of the Republic of Korea to the 1992-93 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation.

Viet Nam

10. Appendix V contains an extract from the report of the Allocations Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992).

FOR DECISION

11. On the recommendation of its Allocations Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for 1992 an annual rate of 0.01 per cent for the contribution of Viet Nam to the 1992-93 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation.

D. ASSESSMENT OF THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF AZERBAIJAN, ESTONIA, KYRGYZSTAN, LATVIA AND LITHUANIA

E. SCALE OF ASSESSMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS FOR 1993

12. Appendix VI contains an extract from the report of the Allocations Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992).

FOR DECISION

13. On the recommendation of its Allocations Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolutions to the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) for adoption:

(i) The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Following the practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations;

Noting that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania in the United Nations for their periods of membership in the United Nations in 1991 and 1992 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992;

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that consideration of the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania for their periods of membership in the Organisation in 1991 and 1992, together with those of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-94 United Nations scale of assessments, be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference,

(ii) The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Following the practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations;

Noting that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithunaia in the United Nations scale of assessments for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations,

(a) to adopt the draft scale of assessments for 1993 as set out in column 4 of Appendix XI to this document, subject to such adjustments as might be necessary following any further change in the membership of the Organisation before the Conference was called upon to adopt the recommended scale;

(b) that the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania for 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(c) that the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other States which formed part of the former USSR and may become Members of the ILO before 1 January 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(d) that consideration of the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-1994 United Nations scale of assessments be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

F. THE WORKING CAPITAL FUND

14. Appendix VII contains an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992).

FOR DECISION

15. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolutions to the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) for adoption:

(i) The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides that, in accordance with article 19, paragraphs 2(a) and 4 of the Financial Regulations, the amounts standing to the credit of member States in Part I of the Working Capital Fund on 31 December 1991 shall be liberated and applied to reduce regular budget contributions payable by member States for 1993, without prejudice to the amendment of the Financial Regulations referred to in the following resolution;

Decides that interest accruing for the year ended 31 December 1992 on the amount so liberated shall be credited to the Working Capital Fund.

(ii) The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that, at the 248th (November 1990) Session of the Governing Body, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had set up a Working Party to review the current arrangements governing the Working Capital Fund;

Recognising that amendments to the Financial Regulations are required in order to implement the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund;

Recalling that the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that amendments to the Financial Regulations required to establish the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions would be introduced at the same time;

Recognising that the 77th (1990) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that one-half of any net premium earned for a biennium on forward purchasing transactions between US dollars and Swiss francs should be distributed to the Incentive Fund, but did not define specific criteria for the distribution of this half of the net premium to member States;

Decides to approve in principle the amendments set out in Appendix XIII, to this document, on the understanding that it will be for the Governing Body, after having had an opportunity to consider more closely at its next session their possible interrelationships with other amendments and proposals still pending, to bring them into effect definitively as from 1 January 1993, and to make proposals for any amendments as may appear appropriate.

G. FINANCIAL REPORT AND AUDITED FINANCIAL STATEMENTS FOR 1990-91

16. Appendix VIII contains an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992).

FOR DECISION

17. At its 253rd Session (May-June 1992) the Governing Body adopted the proposal put forward by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and it therefore recommends that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91.

H. TREATMENT OF 1990-91 CASH SURPLUS

18. Appendix IX contains an extract from the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992).

FOR DECISION

19. On the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body decided on 29 May 1992 to submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 79th Session (June 1992) for adoption:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that for the 1990-91 biennium an excess of regular budget income over regular budget expenditure has resulted in a cash surplus of 19,369,458 Swiss francs;

1. Decides, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, to set aside 10,324,000 Swiss francs of the 1990-91 cash surplus in a special account, to be used for the purpose of financing the purchases of capital equipment itemised in Appendix XII to this document, and 2 million Swiss francs to be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund, thereby reducing by corresponding amounts the sum which would otherwise be available for reducing member States' assessed contributions for 1993.

2. Notes that, taking account of the above appropriations, the amount available under article 18 of the Financial Regulations for reducing the assessed contributions of member States for 1993 will be 7,045,458 Swiss francs.

Appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and to the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board)

8. The Committee considered a paper (GB.253/PFA/9/6) which recalled that, in accordance with article 3 of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund Regulations and article 6(c) of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, three members and three substitute members were appointed for three years by the Conference to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund. In order to enable the Governing Body to be more directly represented in the two bodies which dealt with pensions and to ensure that the principle of tripartism was respected, it was proposed to appoint as titular members, as of 9 October 1992, Mr. Y. Chotard, representing the Government of France on the Governing Body, Miss A.M. Mackie, Employer member of the Governing Body and Mr. R. Vanni, Worker member of the Governing Body. Mr. Chotard and Mr. Vanni would thus be re-elected for a second mandate. Since Messrs. Pelekanos, Schibli and Yoffee had indicated their readiness to continue to participate in the two bodies, it was suggested that they be reappointed as substitute members with effect from the expiration of their current mandate on 8 October 1992. Their competence and long experience in pensions questions, and particularly in the operation of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, would ensure the necessary continuity of the work.

9. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body submit the following resolution to the Conference at its next session:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation:
> Appoints to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund), for a period of three years until 8 October 1995, the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely:

Members:	Mr. Y. CHOTARD (France) Miss A.M. MACKIE (United Kingdom) Mr. R. VANNI (Italy)
Substitute members:	Mr. D. PELEKANOS (Cyprus) Mr. R.M. SCHIBLI (Switzerland) Mr. W.M. YOFFEE (United States).

A. Statute of the Tribunal

10. The Committee considered a paper (GB.253/PFA/10/3) proposing changes in the Statute of the Tribunal Administrative. It was proposed to repeal the distinction between judges and deputy judges on the grounds that it was obsolete. A constant increase in the number of cases required the presence of deputies at all sessions of the Tribunal and a deputy judge no longer sat just when required to replace a judge. It was therefore recommended that the reference in article III, paragraph 1, of the Tribunal's Statute to three judges and four deputy judges be replaced by a reference to seven judges and that article III, paragraph 4, be consequently amended by deleting the words "of whom one at least must be a judge". It was further proposed to add a phrase to article III, paragraph 4, to allow more than three members, but always an odd number in total, to sit in especially important or complicated cases.

11. These changes would entail no significant extra cost for the ILO, as the expenses of sessions or hearings were borne by the organisations against which complaints were filed.

APPENDIX III

B. Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

13. The Committee took note of a paper (GB.253/PFA/10/11) informing it that Mr. Ducoux, President of the Tribunal, had offered his resignation with effect from 17 November 1992, and that Tun Suffian did not envisage an extension of his term of office which was due to expire in June 1992. The Director-General proposed to replace Mr. Ducoux and Tun Suffian by Mr. Michel Gentot and Judge Mark Damian Hugh Fernando, respectively. In addition, the term of office of Mr. Pescatore was due to expire in June 1992, and the Director-General proposed its extension for a further three years.

14. The adoption of the proposed amendment to article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal would abolish the category and title of deputy judge.

15. A representative of the Director-General (the Legal Adviser), replying to a question from the representative of the Government of Ireland, pointed out that, in accordance with the Rules of Court adopted by the Tribunal, it would be for the seven members of the Tribunal to appoint their President and Vice-President when they met at their next session.

16. The Committee recommends to the Governing Body, and through it, to the Conference, that they express their deep appreciation to Mr. Ducoux, who served the Tribunal for many years as Vice-President before assuming, with great distinction, the presidency since 1987, at a time when the Tribunal has been faced with an increase in the number of organisations which have recognised its competence and, above all, a considerable increase in the number of cases before it, as well as to Tun Suffian, who served as a judge, and since 1987 as Vice-President, for the devotion with which both of them have fulfilled their important duties in the service of the international community, and for their outstanding contribution to the development of the law relating to the international civil service.

APPENDIX IV

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 252ND SESSION (FEBRUARY-MARCH 1992)

Assessment of the contributions of the Republic of Korea

2. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.252/AC/1/2) describing the procedure whereby a rate of assessment was fixed for a new member State upon joining the ILO.

3. The Republic of Korea became a Member of the International Labour Organisation on 9 December 1991, and accordingly the Allocations Committee was required to recommend to the Governing Body, for submission to the 79th (1992) Session of the International Labour Conference, a rate of assessment for the Republic of Korea for the period of its membership in 1991 and for the year 1992.

4. Scales of assessment for the calculation of member States' contributions to the budget of the Organisation for 1991 and 1992 had already been adopted by the Conference at its 77th (1990) and 78th (1991) Sessions respectively, which meant that assessments on the Republic of Korea for 1991 and 1992 would be additional to the approved budget of income applicable to those years.

5. The Republic of Korea was admitted as a member State of the United Nations on 17 September 1991, and the 46th Session of the General Assembly had fixed its annual rate of assessment for the period of membership in 1991 and for the years 1992 to 1994 inclusive at 0.69 per cent.

6. The ILO scale of assessments for member States' contributions was based on that of the United Nations, subject only to arithmetical adjustment arising from differences in membership between the two organisations. In the case of the Republic of Korea, the differences in membership in the two organisations resulted in a reduction in the annual rates of assessment from 0.69 per cent to 0.68 per cent, as shown in the Appendix to this report. The Committee acknowledged that it would be necessary to recommend this percentage if it wished to maintain the principle of harmonising the ILO scale of contributions with that of the United Nations.

7. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose to the Conference that the contributions of the Republic of Korea to the ILO budget for the period of its membership of the Organisation during 1991 and for 1992 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.68 per cent.

APPENDIX V

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 253RD SESSION (MAY-JUNE 1992)

Assessment of the contributions of Viet Nam

2. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.253/AC/1/1) describing the procedure applied in fixing a rate of assessment for a new member State upon joining the ILO.

3. The Socialist Republic of Viet Nam resumed membership of the International Labour Organisation on 20 May 1992, and accordingly the Allocations Committee was required to recommend to the Governing Body, for submission to the 79th (1992) Session of the International Labour Conference, a rate of assessment of Viet Nam for the period of its membership in 1992 and for the year 1993.

4. Since a scale of assessment of the calculation of member States' contributions to the budget of the Organisation for 1992 was already adopted by the Conference at its 78th (1991) Session, an assessment for Viet Nam for 1992 would be additional to the approved budget of income for that year.

5. The ILO scale of assessment for member States' contributions was based on that of the United Nations, subject only to arithmetical adjustment arising from differences in membership between the two organisations. In the case of Viet Nam, which was assessed in the UN at the minimum rate of 0.01 per cent, no adjustment was required, and its assessment would therefore be recommended at that rate.

6. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose to the Conference that the contribution of Viet Nam to the ILO budget for the period of its membership of the Organisation during 1992 be based upon an annual assessment rate of 0.01 per cent.

APPENDIX VI

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 253RD SESSION (MAY-JUNE 1992)

Assessment of the contributions of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania

7. The Republic of Kyrgyzstan was admitted to membership of the United Nations on 2 March 1992 and became a member of the International Labour Organisation on 31 March 1992. The Allocations Committee would normally recommend to the Governing Body for submission to the Conference an appropriate rate of assessment for its period of membership in the ILO in 1992, but this was not yet possible because of various matters relating to the determination of the United Nations rate of assessment for Kyrgyzstan.

8. The UN Committee on Contributions will consider an appropriate rate of assessment for Kyrgyzstan at its next meeting in June-July 1992 and any recommendation made by that Committee would not be approved by the General Assembly until its 47th session in late 1992. This situation is the same as that of three other new member States, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, for which rates of assessment were considered by the Allocations Committee at its meeting during the 252nd Session of the Governing Body. Because no information on the UN rates of assessment for these member States will be available until late 1992, the Governing Body decided to propose to the International Labour Conference that consideration of the rates of assessment for these States be deferred until the 80th (1993) Session of the Conference.

9. If the Allocations Committee wished to continue the practice of harmonising as far as possible the ILO rates of assessment with those of the United Nations it would be necessary to recommend to the 79th (1992) Session of the Conference that a decision on the rate of assessment for Kyrgyzstan for the period of its membership in the ILO in 1992 also be deferred until its 80th (1993) Session.

10. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), said that an almost identical situation existed for Azerbaijan, which had joined the ILO on 19 May 1992, too late to be reported in the paper before the Committee. He advised that further States had joined the United Nations on 22 May 1992 and it was possible that some of these countries might apply for membership of the ILO between now and the end of the Conference. As a practical solution he proposed slight modifications to the point for decision in paragraph 7 of the Office paper so as to avoid the need for a meeting of the Allocations Committee on purely procedural matters during the remainder of the present session of the Governing Body or during the 79th (June 1992) Session of the Conference.

11. The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that, in accordance with the established practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations, and taking into account that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan and Kyrgyzstan for their periods of membership in the United Nations in 1992 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992, it propose to the Conference that consideration of the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan and Kyrgyzstan for the period of their membership in the Organisation in 1992, together with those of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-1994 United Nations scale of assessments, be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

12. The paper before the Committee recalled that a draft scale of assessments for 1993 had already been approved by the Governing Body for submission for the 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference. This draft scale did not include rates for Estonia, Latvia or Lithuania, because it was based on the present 1992-1994 scale of assessments approved by the UN General Assembly in November 1991. The General Assembly resolved that a decision on the rates of assessment for these three member States would be taken at its 47th session, upon a recommendation by the Committee on Contributions, and these rates would be deducted from the assessment rate included in the scale for the USSR. The paper noted that a similar situation now applied in respect of Kyrgyzstan, and that the Committee might wish to recommend that the Governing Body propose a revision to the draft scale of assessments of member States for 1993 and expand the proposal in respect of 1993 assessment rates for Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, and the deductions of these assessment rates from that of the Russian Federation, to include Kyrgyzstan.

13. The paper before the Committee was accompanied by an appendix containing a table of the member States of the ILO at the time the paper was prepared, and showing for each:

Column 1 – the percentage rate of assessment in the UN scale in 1991. These assessments totalled 100.51 per cent, due to the differences in membership between the United Nations and the ILO;

Column 2 – the ILO scale of assessment for 1992, which was based on the UN scale for 1989-1991;

Column 3 – the percentage rate of assessment in the UN scale for 1992-1994. These assessments totalled 100.57 per cent due to the differences in membership between the UN and the ILO;

Column 4 – a draft ILO scale of assessment for 1993, based on the UN scale for 1992-1994, adjusted arithmetically for differences in membership, and with the maximum and minimum rates of contribution set at 25 per cent and 0.01 per cent respectively, as in the UN scale;

14. The Treasurer pointed out that Azerbaijan now found itself in a situation analagous to that of Kyrgyzstan, and he proposed minor amendments to the point for decision to avoid the need for a meeting of the Allocations Committee during the remainder of the present Governing Body session or during the forthcoming session of the Conference,

15. Further minor amendments to the point for decision were discussed and agreed upon by the Committee.

16. The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that, in accordance with the established practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations, and taking into account the fact that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania in the UN scale of assessment for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994 would not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992, it propose to the Conference:

(a) the adoption of the draft scale of assessments for 1993 as set out in column 4 of Appendix XI to this paper (Appendix XI to this Provisional Record), subject to such adjustments as might be necessary following any further change in the membership of the Organisation before the Conference was called upon to adopt the recommended scale;

(b) that the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania for 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(c) that the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other States which formed part of the former USSR and may become Members of the ILO before 1 January 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(d) that consideration of the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-1994 United Nations scale of assessments be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

APPENDIX VII

EXTRACT FROM THE FIRST REPORT OF THE PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 253RD SESSION (MAY-JUNE 1992)

102. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.253/PFA/4/4) containing the report of the meeting of the Working Party on the Working Capital Fund held on Friday, 28 February 1992.

103. The Chairman drew the Committee's attention to paragraphs 31 and 32 of the report, presenting two alternative draft resolutions which set out two different positions on the level of the Working Capital Fund. The draft resolution set out in paragraph 31 represented the position taken by a majority of the members of the Working Party which was set out in the form of a recommendation in paragraph 28 of the report. Paragraph 28 recommended that the level of the Working Capital Fund be fixed provisionally at 35 million Swiss francs. It also recommended that the level of the Fund and the proposal to fix the level as a percentage of the total biennium income budget be reviewed after two biennia. Paragraph 32 set out the second draft resolution and represented the views of the Governments of Germany and the United States which were contained in paragraph 29 of the report. These two Governments recommended that the level of the Working Capital Fund be set at 25 million Swiss francs rather than 35 million Swiss francs. They also recommended the removal of the authority to contract loans should the Fund be temporarily insufficient to finance approved expenditure. The Committee should now decide which of these two resolutions to accept.

104. Miss Mackie, on behalf of the Employer members, raised three preliminary points in relation to the discussion of the paper before the Committee. First, the Employer members deplored the late arrival of the report of the Working Party, as some of them had received it only a few hours earlier. As a member of the Working Party, she knew that it had been planned for the Working Party to meet at the beginning of the 252nd (February-March 1992) Session of the Governing Body and that it had been intended to present the report to the Committee at that session. Surely if it had been considered possible to make arrangements for the report to be presented within a week, which was what would have been required, it should have been possible for it to have been ready in March, April, or, at the latest, early May 1992, so that all members of the Committee could consider it, especially as the document was extremely complex in parts.

105. Secondly, the Employer members wished to ask, in view of the lack of urgency attached to the delivery of the document, whether it was now urgent for it to be discussed at the current meeting. The probable answer was that the report contained a recommendation which needed to be brought before the International Labour Conference, and that that should be done at the 1992 Session of the Conference. If that was the case, the report should have been received a month earlier. She asked the representative of the Director-General to explain why the Committee should consider the report without due preparation.

106. Thirdly, the Employer members asked for clarification on the content of the draft resolution submitted by the majority of the members of the Working Party. Paragraph 28, which set out their recommendations, contained three subparagraphs. However paragraph 31, which presented the draft resolution, did not contain anything which reflected subparagraph (c) of paragraph 28. The draft resolution asked for an absolute decision on the level of the Fund to be taken, but excluded the important proviso recorded in subparagraph (c).

107. The Employer members requested a reply to these points after which they would continue with the discussion on the substantive items in the report.

108. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) apologised for the lateness in the delivery of the document, for which he took responsibility. Several members of the Committee had made the same complaint, as had the Director-General. There were various reasons for delays in the delivery of documents for the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and in order to remedy these an internal working party had been set up.

109. With regard to the urgency of discussing the report, the Committee could choose whether or not to continue the discussion. Postponing the discussion would mean that the proposed reimbursement of Part I of the Working Capital Fund would be delayed by one year; apart from this consideration, there was no overriding reason why the resolution had to be considered by the Conference in 1992.

110. Turning to the Employers' question on the exclusion of subparagraph (c) of paragraph 28 from the draft resolution, he explained that a review of the level of the Working Capital Fund to be decided by the Governing Body did not require a Conference resolution. However, if the Committee preferred that the Conference decide that a review should be made after two biennia, then that proposal could be included in the draft resolution.

111. Miss Mackie accepted the apology from the Treasurer, but was dismayed that no specific reason had been given for the delay in the delivery of the report. She also regretted that she had not received an answer, other than the obvious, on whether it was necessary to discuss the report at this session of the Committee. Some of the report concerned matters upon which there was not unanimous agreement. The point to which the Treasurer referred, the reimbursement of Part I of the Working Capital Fund, had been agreed to unanimously, and it was feasible, although not preferable, for the Committee to deal with that. Discussion on the more complex matters should be deferred. If the Working Party, which was set up specially to consider these points, could not agree, then it was difficult to imagine how members of the full Committee, who had had little time to consider its contents, could be expected to reach decisions on matters of principle as well as textual amendments.

112. The representative of the Government of Denmark felt that, although it was unacceptable that the report had not been delivered in reasonable time, it was also unacceptable to defer the discussion and not deal with any of the matters contained in the report. He believed that the draft resolution contained in paragraph 30 could be discussed. As the author of a compromise for which few of his Government colleagues had initially shown much enthusiasm, he would feel very disappointed if this part of the report could not be dealt with. It was unacceptable that the Conference could not decide to reimburse Part I of the Working Capital Fund and that these reimbursements could not be deducted from contributions for 1993.

113. The representative of the Government of Italy was against postponement if agreement could be reached immediately. The Committee could adopt the two unanimous proposals and postpone discussion of the others which reflected difficult problems.

114. The representative of the Government of Germany sympathised with the Employer members and agreed that the whole issue was complex and far-reaching. He suggested that the External Auditor clarify some of the financial questions and the Committee could meanwhile come to a decision on the points upon which the Working Party had reached unanimous agreement.

115. The representative of the Government of Nigeria agreed with the Employer members that the Committee members had not had sufficient time to examine the document. Papers needed to be distributed early enough to allow for consultation and clarification of any ambiguities. He felt that in November 1992 the Committee would be in a better position to consider these issues.

116. The representative of the Government of the United States expressed his support for the representative of the Government of Germany's request for clarification of the proposals by the External Auditor. He also wondered whether, if the draft amendment concerning the incentive fund was not adopted until 1993, this would mean that the rebates to countries would be delayed. He considered that the Committee should go ahead with the adoption of those proposals agreed on unanimously by members of the Working Party.

117. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom mentioned that delays in distribution of documents had occurred on other occasions, and that this had not prevented the Committee from continuing its deliberations. There was no justification for a delay in this case since this was not a new issue. It had already been debated a number of times in the Governing Body and thoroughly at the meetings of the Working Party. She also pointed out that the document had been in the possession of all groups, albeit in draft form, since early March.

118. After further comments, it was clear that the views of Committee members fell initially into two groups. First, there were those who wished to recommend that the draft resolutions in paragraph 30 unanimously accepted by the Working Party should be proposed by the Governing Body to the forthcoming session of the Conference, so that the amounts standing to the credit of member States in Part I of the Working Capital Fund on 31 December 1991 could be liberated and applied to reduce regular budget contributions payable by member States for 1993, with consideration of the other draft resolutions deferred to a later session of the Governing Body.

119. Another group of members felt that the document had been distributed too late for full consideration before the present meeting and that no decisions concerning the recommendations of the Working Party should be taken at this session of the Governing Body.

120. In answer to a question, the Legal Adviser observed that, in application of article 19.4 of the Financial Regulations as they presently existed, the Conference could perfectly limit itself to the adoption of the decision in paragraph 30(a). However, if in the view of the Committee the draft resolution in paragraph 30, which had been unanimously agreed, was supposed to form a package, he proposed the following amendments to the text of the draft resolutions contained in paragraph 30 of the Office paper, in order to reconcile the desire to distribute Part I of the Working Capital Fund with the need for a less hasty consideration of the possible interrelationships between the amendments which had been unanimously agreed and those which had not:

30(a) Insert after "1993" in the last line of the first paragraph "subject to the adoption of the amendments to the Financial Regulations contained in Appendix I in the manner referred to in paragraph (b)";

30(b) Replace last paragraph with: "Decides to approve in principle the amendments set out in Appendix I, on the understanding that it will be for the Governing Body, after having had an opportunity to consider more closely at its next session their possible interrelationships with other amendments and proposals still pending, to bring them into effect definitively as from 1 January 1993 with such possible amendments as may appear appropriate."

121. After further discussion a consensus of the Committee agreed on the following compromise position:

- That the draft resolutions in paragraphs 30(a) and 30(b), with appropriate amendments in the light of the previous proposals and of the discussion, be proposed to the Governing Body for submission to the Conference;
- That the Governing Body defer to its November 1992 Session consideration of the amendments to the Financial Regulations, which had not been unanimously agreed by the Working Party.

122. The amended texts to the resolutions in paragraph 30 are reproduced in paragraphs 123 and 124 below:

123. The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee proposes to the Governing Body for submission to the 79th (1992) Session of the International Labour Conference a resolution in the following terms:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
> Decides that, in accordance with article 19, paragraphs 2(a) and 4 of the Financial Regulations, the amounts standing to the credit of member States in Part I of the Working Capital Fund on 31 December 1991 shall be liberated and applied to reduce regular budget contributions payable by member States for 1993, without prejudice to the amendment of the Financial Regulations referred to in paragraph 124;
> Decides that interest accruing for the year ended 31 December 1992 on the amount so liberated shall be credited to the Working Capital Fund.

124. The Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee proposes to the Governing Body for submission to the 79th (1992) Session of the International Labour Conference a resolution in the following terms:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
> Recalling that, at the 248th (November 1990) Session of the Governing Body, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had set up a Working Party to review the current arrangements governing the Working Capital Fund;
> Recognising that amendments to the Financial Regulations are required in order to implement the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund;
> Recalling that the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that amendments to the Financial Regulations required to establish the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions would be introduced at the same time;
> Recognising that the 77th (1990) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that one-half of any net premium earned for a biennium on forward purchasing transactions between US dollars and Swiss francs should be distributed to the Incentive Fund, but did not define specific criteria for the distribution of this half of the net premium to member States;
> Decides to approve in principle the amendments set out in Appendix I, on the understanding that it will be for the Governing Body, after having had an opportunity to consider more closely at its next session their possible interrelationships with other amendments and proposals still pending, to bring them into effect definitively as from 1 January 1993, and to make proposals for any amendments as may appear appropriate.

APPENDIX VIII

EXTRACT FROM THE FIRST REPORT OF THE PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 253RD SESSION (MAY-JUNE 1992)

Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements

7. The Committee was invited to take note of the Auditor's report and to propose that the Governing Body submit the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) to the Conference for consideration and adoption (GB.253/PFA/1/1).

8. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) indicated that in the English version of the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91, on page 20, paragraph 89 was incomplete and paragraph 90 omitted altogether. The correct full text for both paragraphs was as follows:

> 89. In my report on ILO's 1986-87 accounts I commented on ILO's procedures for monitoring and evaluating programmes and projects, including technical cooperation projects, and identified inconsistencies in the standard of reporting and monitoring at project level. In 1987, the 73rd International Labour Conference adopted Resolution VI concerning the role of the ILO in technical cooperation. This resolution included 45 conclusions designed to improve ILO's approach to technical cooperation and the management of project activities. It noted the continuing need to improve the quality, efficiency and practicality of the technical cooperation programme and called for improvements in project design, financial planning, monitoring and evaluation.
> 90. Since 1988 the Director-General has reported annually to the Conference on action taken in response to the Resolution. ILO have concentrated their efforts on ensuring that operational activities complement their objective of improving working conditions through international labour standards; and maximising participation of government and donors in technical cooperation.

9. Sir John Bourn, the Comptroller and Auditor-General of the United Kingdom, introducing his report on the financial statements, expressed his pleasure at having the opportunity of presenting personally his report to the Committee. As the External Auditor of the ILO he was completely independent and his report likewise was objective and impartial. Nevertheless, he was committed to the objectives and purposes of the ILO and saw his role as External Auditor to report independently and from outside, but he was none the less as committed to the success of the ILO as the Committee itself. It was in this spirit of objectivity and commitment that his report and address were delivered.

10. In conjunction with his audit of the regular budget and the subsidiary funds of the ILO he also examined and gave audit opinions and, where appropriate, reported on the separate financial statements relating to the ILO's participation in the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Population Fund. He pointed out that in the published financial statements for 1990-91 his main report was followed by a shorter report on the ILO's UNDP funds. The UNDP report was separately transmitted to the United Nations Development Programme but arose from work carried out in connection with his main report on the ILO.

11. There were four general points to be made about the audit report. Firstly, on the financial audit, he was glad to report that the results summarised in the audit opinion confirmed that the financial statements presented fairly the ILO's financial position as at 31 December 1991 and the results of its operations during the biennium. He was therefore pleased to give an unqualified opinion on the ILO's financial statements for that biennium.

12. Secondly, referring to the audit of management matters, he pointed out that this was undertaken in accordance with article 36.2 of the Financial Regulations which required him to comment in general on the administration and management of the Organisation. For 1990-91 an examination was carried out on technical cooperation projects because of the significance of the ILO's work in assisting governments in promoting sustainable development in employment through regional, national and local projects.

13. Thirdly, there was a brief comment to be made on the action taken on recommendations in previous audit reports. He was glad to note the positive response given by the Office on recommendations made in previous reports; in particular, the improvements in the control exercised over allocation changes, in the guidance issued to staff responsible for the ILO external offices' and UNDP account verification, and in the introduction of quarterly reporting to headquarters by the Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific on the scope and depth of account verification. The Office had, of course, provided its own report to the Committee on the recommendations in his audit report for the previous biennium but he wished to mention that he felt his recommendations for the 1988-89 biennium had been taken seriously and that really useful action had been taken by the Office.

14. Fourthly, he pointed out that his report followed the new format recommended by the United Nations Panel of External Auditors.

15. On a more detailed level, paragraphs 20 and 47-50 of the report described the system of Swiss franc assessments combined with the forward purchasing of US dollar requirements, introduced in 1990-91. The report drew attention to the consequential changes arising from this system in the presentation of the ILO's financial statements, including in particular the introduction of a new schedule 2.2 which showed the calculation of the net premium earned for 1990-91, amounting to $7.5 million. This was an important addition to the contents of the financial statements.

16. Paragraphs 21-22 and 51-55 dealt with the ILO plans to complete the decentralisation of accounting functions to the Americas region in 1990. These had been deferred to 1992 because of problems in establishing reliable communication links. The External Auditor was concerned that there had been significant delays in processing imprests and accounts and he recommended in his report that the ILO should take steps to ensure the timely processing and verification of data coming in from the field.

17. Paragraphs 24-26 and 59-68 dealt with internal audit, which had been reviewed in 1990-91. The External Auditor valued the important work done by the internal auditors and was keen to ensure their continued effectiveness. It was gratifying to see that the Office intended to review whether there was a need to strengthen the independence of internal audit and its agreement to introduce more systematic planning and training for internal audit staff.

18. Paragraphs 27, 29 and 69-76 described the review carried out of the ILO computer installation and pointed out that after the reorganisation of computer services begun in 1991 the revised structure now corresponded with the main operational functions of the branch. The review identified a number of areas where the computer installation controls should be strengthened, and he was pleased to note that the Office would be addressing these matters in the 1992-93 biennium.

19. Paragraphs 30-31 and 77-84 referred to the review of inventory control. During the review it was found that inventory records had not been kept up to date in all cases, which meant that the value of supplies and equipment recorded at 31 December 1991 were unable to be fully substantiated. He recommended that the ILO should review the status and management of inventories and the arrangements for keeping them up to date.

20. The External Auditor noted that a CCAQ(FB) Working Party had been established to make proposals on common accounting standards for United Nations agencies and he strongly supported the ILO's participation in this important work.

21. Turning to management matters and the examination of technical cooperation projects, he was pleased that the review showed that the majority of project documents, documents crucial for the success of technical cooperation projects, properly showed objectives, resource requirements and planned activities. Although the general quality of these documents was satisfactory, in some projects there were shortcomings which had contributed to delays in implementation and he welcomed the steps that had been taken by the ILO to improve the planning and design of projects. The scope and coverage of project work plans had varied considerably and he recommended that the ILO establish a standard format of work plans and issue guidelines to improve their effectiveness.

22. The quality of progress reporting varied significantly between projects and there was no Office-wide monitoring system to help in the identification of outstanding and overdue progress and evaluation reports. This was dealt with in detail in paragraphs 35-39 and 105-113. He was pleased to see that the ILO was reviewing the need to extend existing monitoring systems to all technical cooperation projects and he recommended that the ILO should introduce standard formats for progress reporting to ensure consistent and high quality reporting.

23. The audit examination had revealed several projects where recorded commitments or expenditure exceeded allocations, in contravention of the ILO Financial Rules. This was dealt with in detail in paragraphs 40-42 and 114-118 of the report, and he welcomed the ILO's plans to ensure the prompt identification and correction of instances where allocations were overspent and to ensure that allocations were updated on a timely basis.

24. A review of project delivery was described in paragraphs 43-44 and 119-124 of the report. Some of the principal causes of delay in the implementation of projects were identified as the difficulties in the recruitment of chief technical advisers, the lengthy government approval procedures and problems arising from securing funds from donors. He acknowledged that many of the difficulties facing the ILO were not under its own control or within its field of competence, but he recommended that it explore the possibility of identifying suitable candidates and resource needs well in advance so as to minimise these delays. Paragraphs 45-46 and 125-130 described the review carried out on project evaluation and he was pleased to see that the ILO was now reviewing evaluation criteria for large or technically demanding projects, although in his view all major projects should be subjected to a measure of independent review.

25. The Comptroller and Auditor-General said that his oral report covered only some of the highlights of his examination, but they were fully documented in his written report included with the financial statements. He also expressed his appreciation for the open and constructive cooperation given to his staff by the Office and in particular by the headquarters finance staff. The good working relationships which he as the External Auditor enjoyed with the Office and the headquarters finance staff represented a most positive contribution to the effectiveness of the audit. Sir John concluded by saying that he was delighted on this occasion to have had the opportunity to present his report in person.

26. Miss Mackie, for the Employer members, expressed appreciation for a document which was comprehensive, helpful and valuable for the work of the Committee, and for the audit report just introduced by Sir John Bourn. His comments were illuminating and were provided in a spirit of objectivity and commitment. Unfortunately, the Committee did not give itself enough opportunity to discuss the financial report and audited financial statements. They were worth more than a cursory examination and perhaps as part of a review of Governing Body procedures consideration could be given to whether a small technical subcommittee of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee could be established, to look in greater detail at the various committee documents so that the Committee could carry out its work more effectively. In this way the Committee could make even better use of material such as the External Auditor's Report.

27. Ms. Carr, for the Worker members, also expressed appreciation for the document before the Committee and for the oral report just given by Sir John Bourn. The report seemed to indicate that there were no major problems in the financial accounts and management of the Office, even though there was room for improvement in the areas highlighted so clearly in the External Auditor's Report. The Workers were happy to support the point for decision.

28. The representative of the Government of Germany associated himself with the remarks of the two previous speakers in expressing appreciation to Sir John Bourn for the quality of his report. In view of its contents, he wondered whether it was sufficient merely to propose that the Governing Body should submit the financial accounts to the Conference for consideration and adoption. The report contained many interesting comments and suggestions concerning the implementation of technical assistance and it was not enough only to take note of them. Perhaps the Director-General could be asked to report to the 1993 Conference on the response the Office was able to make to the suggestions of the External Auditor, or on the future plans for doing so. It should not involve much extra work because the Office had to consider anyway what to do about the External Auditor's suggestions, and this could simply be included in a report to the Conference. Procedurally it should also be simple enough and should not require any amendments to the Financial Regulations.

29. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom joined previous speakers in expressing appreciation to the External Auditor for his report on the ILO's financial statements. It was very reassuring to the Committee to know that the audit of the ILO was in the hands of an independent expert. A number of matters gave rise to concern - project expenditure in excess of allocations, 43 out of 92 projects reviewed delayed between six and 19 months, and the delay in processing accounts from the field which resulted, for example, in 70 per cent of external office accounts for October 1991 not being entered by the end of December. It was also alarming that the ILO had no disaster contingency plan for its computer system even though external consultants had twice proposed that such action should be taken. The Committee was confident that the Office took appropriate remedial action whenever problems were identified, but she agreed with the previous speaker and also with the Employers that it would be helpful to have some more formal and regular follow-up to the External Auditor's Report, and it should become a regular feature on the Committee agenda, for reference to either the Governing Body or the Conference, as appropriate.

30. Mr. Nasr (Employer member) expressed appreciation for the Report of the External Auditor and observed that the paragraphs dealing with technical assistance gave useful guidance on how financial and control procedures for technical assistance could be improved. The Office should take careful note of the External Auditor's comments, especially those relating to project delivery and proper control of the supply of equipment.

31. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) assured the representative of the Government of Germany that the Office had always followed up on the report of the External Auditor and, indeed, would have been taken to task by the External Auditor himself over the years if it had not. The Office would continue to do so because he, as Treasurer, as much as anyone in the Committee, appreciated the Report of the External Auditor. Admittedly, an organisation that spent over $1 million a day was bound to have certain shortcomings no matter what it did; hence it was useful for weaknesses to be identified by the External Auditor as an independent expert.

32. The assumption until two years ago - and it was a totally valid assumption was that the Office followed up without any prompting from the Governing Body or anyone else on recommendations made by the External Auditor. However, two years ago the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had requested the Office to produce a formal report on the follow-up given to the External Auditor's Report and this would be considered under the next item on the agenda. This was not a one-time exercise but after discussions with the External Auditor the Office believed that, subject to the views of the Committee, it might in future be prefeable to present this report after the first year of a biennium, with follow-up also reported in the External Auditor's Report one year later. Again subject to the views of the Committee, the Office paper might perhaps be included in the Provisional Record for the Finance Committee of Government Representatives so that it was informed of what action had been taken. However, it should be clearly understood that although the reporting procedures might be new the Office had always acted upon these recommendations. If it had not, the External Auditor would certainly have said so, so in this sense no news was good news.

33. Another important development was that the United Nations Panel of External Auditors had decided that audit reports should now include a reference to follow-up action to recommendations in previous reports. From now on, as a matter of course, the Committee would have a report on these matters from both the Office and the External Auditor.

34. Turning to some of the specific criticisms raised by members of the Committee, the Treasurer pointed out that the excess of expenditure over allocations reported on some projects was not as bad as it appeared. For example, frequently a UNDP project might be nearing the end of its life and the ILO and UNDP would be engaged in negotiations to renew or extend the project. Normally the ILO would be advised by facsimile or telex by the UNDP Resident Coordinator that the project was to be extended. It could take weeks or even months for this instruction to move through the UNDP and ILO bureaucracies and show up as an increase to a project allocation. Once the Resident Coordinator indicated that a project was to be extended, however, the ILO was perfectly ready to continue with commitments for expenditure because the paperwork was a formality. The same situation existed with respect to trust funds. Furthermore, in paragraph 117 of the External Auditor's Report, it was stated that the ILO had investigated the negative balances and had found only one case where expenditure commitments plus valid obligations exceeded funds available. To date, the ILO had never incurred a loss in committing expenditure before the allocation was available. Nevertheless, the ILO was now more sensitive to negative allocation balances and an official was being assigned to monitor them so that they could be corrected earlier or perhaps even eliminated altogether.

35. Paragraph 120 of the External Auditor's Report gave the reasons for delays in project delivery. Occasionally there were delays in equipment purchasing because of the need to call for tenders, but the great majority of delays were caused by recruitment problems, government approval procedures and availability of donor funds. The ILO did not take these delays less seriously simply because they were outside its control. It was a full partner in technical cooperation projects and would do all it could in discussions with donors and recipient governments to accelerate procedures.

36. The Treasurer agreed with the comment of the representative of the Government of the United Kingdom that it was extremely worrying that the Organisation was so vulnerable in the absence of any disaster contingency plans for its computer systems. Such a plan would cost about $1 million but it had not been possible to allocate the necessary funds in view of the current zero growth regime.

37. The representative of the Government of Nigeria could not accept the Treasurer's observation that no news was good news because he had not received a copy of the External Auditor's Report, and was not familiar with its contents. However, he was confident that other members of the Committee would make criticisms where they were justified. It was not clear to what extent project evaluations looked at the efficient use of resources. In his own country there was probably more scope fot replacing expensive international experts with cheaper local experts, and this could perhaps be investigated further. He associated himself with the remarks of the representative of the Government of Germany concerning the Report of the External Auditor, and he urged the Office to ensure that in future the Committee documents were dispatched earlier.

38. The Treasurer replied that the Financial Regulations provided that the audited accounts were to be circulated to member States six weeks before the opening of the Conference, and this invariably was done. Copies were sent to the capital cities of member States and to the missions. If particular problems in the transmission of the document could be identified, advance arrangements could be made to use special couriers. His earlier statement that no news was good news was used in a special sense, and meant that the External Auditor had never reported to the Governing Body that the Office was ignoring his Report. From now on, of course, the External Auditor would be reporting every two years in the normal way on the ILO's follow-up to his recommendations, and the ILO itself would be reporting every other year. With regard to technical cooperation projects, for trust fund projects the ILO charged actual cost and, for UNDP projects, the standard cost set by UNDP itself.

39. The Committee took note of the External Auditor's Report.

40. The Committee proposes that the Governing Body submit the final accounts for the 62nd financial period (1990-91) to the 79th (June 1992) Session of the International Labour Conference for consideration and adoption.

APPENDIX IX

EXTRACT FROM THE FIRST REPORT OF THE PROGRAMME, FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE TO THE GOVERNING BODY AT ITS 253RD SESSION (MAY-JUNE 1992)

Treatment of 1990-91 cash surplus

49. The Committee had before it a paper (GB.253/PFA/3/7) containing proposals concerning the 1990-91 cash surplus.

50. Miss Mackie, speaking on behalf of the Employer members, stated that the paper had been the subject of considerable discussion by the Employers' group and that a wide variety of views had been expressed. The ILO had experienced income shortfalls in the past and had taken certain management decisions, which included expenditure reductions, in anticipation of such income shortfalls. In order to state her group's position clearly, it would be useful to have details of relevant programme reductions made by the ILO.

51. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), in response to Miss Mackie, gave brief details regarding programme reductions in 1986-87 and 1988-89, which had affected most departments. It was difficult to determine whether programmes which had been reduced in the past were still valid at the present time, but fuller details regarding the programme cuts could be made available to the Employers' group if required.

52. Miss Mackie thanked the Treasurer for the information provided and pointed out that, in accordance with the ILO's Financial Regulations, income shortfalls could have been compensated by withdrawals from the Working Capital Fund, which would have required replenishment by supplementary assessments on member States. The Governing Body had decided, however, when it was the largest contributor that was falling behind and the size of the shortfall was considerable, that it was more sensible to restrict the ILO's activities. As a consequence, member States were not called upon to make up the shortfall. Now the payment of those arrears of contributions had resulted in a cash surplus. The redistribution of such a surplus to member States would not constitute a reimbursement to them; it would represent a paradoxical situation where the late payment of contributions by member States resulted in part of those contributions being repaid to them. The Director-General's proposal to waive the provisions of article 18 was therefore fully supported.

53. Several of the items proposed for funding through the cash surplus had already been approved by the Governing Body. Due to the constraints of a zero-growth budget, however, it had not been possible to make the necessary budgetary provisions for these proposals in the past. The proposed items of expenditure were valid and necessary and would contribute considerably to the efficiency of the Office. This was especially true where substantial investment had already been made and where further funding was now required to ensure that full benefit was derived from the proposed improvements.

54. In order to enable the Committee to monitor the expenditure proposed in the paper, a small group or subcommittee should be created which would be in a better position to carry out a detailed assessment of the Office's use of these funds, and should submit progress reports to the Committee in the future. This would provide the Committee with a much tighter means of control and involvement than was presently available.

55. Ms. Carr, speaking on behalf of the Worker members, agreed that the ILO should not be penalised because of late payments made by member States. The proposals set out in the paper were very valid and represented a real need for modernisation which would ensure the improved efficiency of the ILO in the future. The repayment of the cash surplus to member States was certainly unacceptable, since it had resulted directly from the late payment of certain member States' contributions. The proposed waiver of article 18 of the Financial Regulations was therefore totally supported.

56. With specific reference to the proposed electronic voting system, there should be control over the use of the system by other parties, and the question of ownership should be clarified in view of the fact that it would be financed from ILO funds. With regard to the proposed transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund, it would be useful to have details of the proposed use of the Fund.

57. The representative of the Government of Morocco stated that it was very difficult to carry out necessary improvements under a zero-growth budget. The proposed waiver of article 18 of the Financial Regulations was therefore supported.

58. The representative of the Government of Germany agreed that it was important that member States' contributions should be paid on time. The provisions of article 18 should, however, be strictly adhered to. It was not clear how the proposed investments would have been funded had the cash surplus not existed. Although the proposals were well motivated, his Government was not convinced that a waiver of article 18 should be accepted.

59. The representative of the Government of Canada stated that, although it was important that the Financial Regulations should be strictly applied, it was recognised that, when income shortfalls had occurred, it had been extremely difficult to include provisions in the budget for certain major items of capital expenditure. It was therefore reasonable to consider such expenditure now that arrears had been paid. A distinction should, however, be made between items that constituted an investment and those that were clearly normal maintenance. The former category would include the electronic voting system, cabling, text processing, electronic mail and the PERSIS project, whereas repairs to sound equipment, telephones and the proposed transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund would fall under the latter, and were, or should have been provided for in the regular budget.

60. The representative of the Government of India noted that capital investment in equipment during the last few years by the Office had been hampered by the imposition of zero real growth and related budgetary cuts. While her country stood to gain considerably if the surplus was distributed amongst member States, she endorsed the proposals, which would engender greater long-term efficiency and productivity within the Office.

61. The representative of the Government of Nigeria advised caution in departing from the Financial Regulations, in particular article 18. He questioned the need to replace existing equipment if it was already functioning efficiently. Countries currently facing difficult economic and financial conditions may already have difficulty in meeting future assessed contributions, and the strict application of article 18 would help such countries to do so.

62. The representative of the Government of Chad also referred to the current political and economic difficulties faced in particular by the French-speaking African countries. One outcome was that contribution payments were often delayed, but he stressed that this did not indicate any lack of goodwill on the part of member States. Where a member State's contributions were in arrears for more than two years, it might be more beneficial for the ILO to organise a mission to the country to initiate contacts at the proper government level in an attempt to find a solution rather than continuing with an exchange of correspondence.

63. The representative of the Government of Denmark complimented the Office on the positive financial management leading to the budgetary savings in the 1986-87 and 1988-89 biennia. The current proposals represented a serious and positive management approach and he strongly supported them. However, the presentation could have been enhanced by a more detailed analysis of each proposal. He was unable to support the proposed transfer of 4 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund until additional information had been supplied. He also noted the worsening situation concerning the dispatch of the Office's documents to member countries, and wondered whether the Office could establish a working group to analyse the procedures and eventually introduce measures to improve the current system.

64. The representative of the Government of the United Arab Emirates acknowledged the importance of the proposals, but stressed that the Financial Regulations and in particular article 18 should be strictly adhered to. Consideration of these proposals could only legally be contemplated once article 18 had been amended, and he recommended that if the Committee wished to proceed along these lines, this should be the first priority.

65. The representative of the Government of Italy agreed with other speakers that it was important to adhere to the Financial Regulations and that any derogation from them must be restricted to exceptional circumstances only. The proposals for the modernisation of existing equipment and for investment in new technology represented long-term objectives for which the Office had already committed resources in some areas in the 1990-91 biennium. These were ongoing commitments built into the regular programme and budget and should therefore not be included as part of the one-time exceptional proposals presented in the paper.

66. Of the proposals presented, an electronic voting system would undoubtedly save time and money, and he supported both it and the proposal on the PERSIS project. The replacement of the central text-processing equipment could be supported if the contribution was to be used to complete the project, but otherwise, it should remain as a regular budget commitment, together with the remaining proposals.

67. The representative of the Government of Lesotho stressed that the Organisation needed to keep abreast of current technological advances in communication and audio systems and supported the proposals as presented.

68. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom affirmed her Government's position that the Financial Regulations should always be adhered to, although she noted that one of the reasons that a surplus existed was that not all governments had abided by them in the past. She agreed that the Office's programmes should not be constrained by unreliable obsolete equipment, but added that regular budget programmes, notably programme 170.4, already contained a sizable provision for the maintenance and repair of technical installations. It was true none the less that past budgetary constraints faced by the Office imposed difficulties for the proper repair and maintenance of Office equipment, and for this reason the proposals should receive sympathetic consideration. However, she agreed with the representative of the Government of Canada that a clear distinction needed to be established between exceptional items and those items that would normally be incorporated into a regular budget programme.

69. She expressed support for the electronic voting system and suggested that it might be feasible for the Office to rent out the system later to interested users as a means of recovering some of the initial investment, but was unconvinced in respect of the proposal to increase the Building and Accommodation Fund by 4 million Swiss francs without more specific details of how the funds would be spent.

70. The representative of the Government of France endorsed the remarks of earlier speakers. The Financial Regulations should be applied sensibly, and he considered that investment by the Office in new technology and equipment when funds were available represented a sensible management approach. It was clear that any delay now would only commit the Office to greater expenditure in the future and he fully supported the proposals of the Office.

71. The representative of the Government of Australia acknowledged that the Office was emerging from an extended period of financial difficulty during which capital investment had been restrained. He supported in principle the proposed investment in equipment, and recommended the waiver of article 18 of the Financial Regulations as an exceptional measure, although he felt that a more thorough cost-benefit analysis should have been provided for each item. In the absence of any specific building proposals, he was unable to support the transfer of resources to the Building and Accommodation Fund, but would welcome any additional detailed information provided by the Office. He endorsed earlier speakers' comments that the Office should clarify the exact priority of the computer disaster back-up system before any decision was made.

72. The representative of the Government of the United States stressed that the 1990-91 cash surplus should be returned to member governments as stipulated by article 18 of the Financial Regulations. He acknowledged the financial difficulties the Office had faced over recent biennia and thought that the proposals for equipment and repairs should be considered sympathetically, but could not support the proposal for transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund until the Office was able to put forward specific proposals on how the money would be spent.

73. The representative of the Government of Ireland expressed concern over the departure from the strict application of the Financial Regulations. This was not the first time this had occurred and the Office perhaps needed to re-examine and amend the existing Regulations so that they remained applicable even in exceptional circumstances.

74. He supported the proposed expenditure on equipment items which should generate improved efficiency within the Office. In respect of the proposed transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund, no clear proposals had been put forward, and he was unable to support the point for decision as it stood.

75. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) explained that the balance in the Building and Accommodation Fund as reported in the audited accounts was only the actual cash balance of the Fund. As described in the footnote, the Governing Body had already approved expenditure of 2.6 million Swiss Francs under the Fund this biennium and the available balance was therefore considerably less.

76. The Director-General had occasionally been informally approached by some member States in which ILO offices were situated on the possibility of the construction of premises to accommodate the ILO office, with the host country making a gift of the required land. It had not been possible to pursue these tentative offers in view of the limited funds available under the Building and Accommodation Fund. He cited examples of certain recent offers that had been made.

77. The installation of electronic voting equipment at the Palais des Nations would require the permanent installation of cables and wiring only. All portable equipment would be kept in the Office and any request for hiring or renting could be negotiated by the Office in accordance with normal procedures.

78. In respect of the audio system, patchwork repairs were very costly and the entire system should be replaced. It was equally important for the Committee to take prompt decisions concerning the installation of cabling systems which was now half completed, and the replacement of the telephone exchange which was now 17 years old. The PTT had advised the Office that the telephone system was obsolete and they would not be able to maintain it for more than two years.

79. In reply to the question from the representative of the Government of Germany, the Treasurer stated that the proposals had not been put forward merely because there was a cash surplus. The 1990-95 Medium-Term Plan, discussed in 1988, referred to the inadequacy of the telephone system and there was a constant stream of complaints about the audio system. The only reason these proposals had not been included in normal budgetary proposals was the zero-growth regime imposed on the Office in recent years.

80. The Chairman, in summing up the discussion so far, observed that there seemed to be a fairly broad measure of consensus in favour of the items of equipment described in paragraph 22 of the Office paper. Equally, there appeared to be a number of reservations against the transfer of 4 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund, particularly in the absence of concrete proposals on what these funds would be used for. So as not to prolong the debate unnecessarily a workable compromise might be to accept the Office proposal, except for the transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund, and to discuss this last matter in more detail when the Office was able to present specific proposals.

81. Ms. Carr expressed the Workers' agreement with the Chairman's summation, but added that the 4 million Swiss francs originally proposed for the Building and Accommodation Fund should not be refunded to member States. It should be set aside in a reserve account pending discussions by the Committee on firm proposals from the Office.

82. Miss Mackie said that the Employers very much regretted that arguments advanced against returning money as part of the cash surplus had not been fully recognised in the suggested compromise, and associated herself with the proposal put forward by the Workers that the 4 million Swiss francs should be retained in a frozen account for the time being.

83. The representative of the Government of Germany had reservations about the proposal. Nevertheless, if the 4 million Swiss francs proposed for the Building and Accommodation Fund was to be transferred to the cash surplus for distribution to member States he would be prepared to withdraw the reservations he had expressed earlier.

84. The representative of the Government of Morocco expressed his support for the compromise proposal put forward by the Chairman.

85. The representative of the Government of Denmark was unable to agree to the suggestion that the 4 million Swiss francs should be added to the cash surplus for distribution. Many convincing arguments had been put forward in favour of a transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund. Perhaps the Committee might agree to a transfer of 2 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund, with the remaining 2 million Swiss francs being added to the cash surplus.

86. Ms. Carr was unable to accept this proposal. The great majority of speakers had expressed themselves in favour of the proposal in the Office paper, and she reiterated her view that the 4 million Swiss francs should be placed aside until proposals on how it might be used were discussed.

87. Miss Mackie expressed full support for the remarks of the previous speaker. However, even that position was a substantial concession from what the Employers originally wanted because there were strong and convincing arguments in favour of retaining the entire sum and thus making it possible to consider restoring provisions for expenditure previously deleted.

88. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom thought the Chairman's proposal was a sensible compromise. From the course of the discussion so far, it was clear that many speakers had made substantial concessions from their original positions and the Committee was on the verge of reaching agreement. She urged the Employer and Worker members to reconsider their views on the treatment of the 4 million Swiss francs so that the Committee could come to a decision without further ado.

89. Ms. Carr observed that many of the speakers so far had expressed themselves - some admittedly with reluctance - in favour of the proposals for expenditure on equipment, even though they were against the transfer of 4 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund. But even here they had expressed a willingness to consider firm proposals from the Office and the Workers believed it would be wrong for the 4 million to be added to the cash surplus for distribution before the Committee had debated these proposals. All she was asking was that the 4 million Swiss francs be placed in a reserve account and not distributed in the meantime.

90. Miss Mackie said that there was substantial agreement among the Employer members to the compromise. During their discussions the Employer members had taken note of the remarks made by the External Auditor concerning disaster recovery precautions and the possibility that these might cost 1 million Swiss francs. Although the Employer members were not proposing a further amendment, they wished to record their surprise that a matter of this importance had not formed part of the list. In regard to the proposed compromise solution, the Employer members agreed, albeit reluctantly, to accept it.

91. Ms. Carr said that the Worker members accepted the proposed compromise solution that 2 million Swiss francs should be refunded to member States in accordance with article 18, and that 2 million Swiss francs should be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund.

92. The representative of the Government of the United States, clarifying his earlier statement, restated that his Government had hoped that a refund would be made in accordance with article 18, but was nevertheless willing to accept that the Organisation needed the extra money to repair, upgrade or buy equipment. However, he was not in favour of any transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund, which could be considered as a contingency fund. If money was needed for building purposes then proposals should have been made and considered as part of the normal budget procedure. It was disappointing that governments had once again been asked to compromise and give up money which should have been reimbursed to them in accordance with the Financial Regulations. The governments had made an extremely generous compromise by agreeing to these proposals, but were unhappy to have been asked once again to give up money which should have been refunded to them. It was preferable to adhere to the Financial Regulations.

93. The representative of the Government of Germany agreed with the position taken by the representative of the Government of the United States. He did not believe that the Building and Accommodation Fund should receive 2 million Swiss francs because 4 million francs was too much; nor was he convinced either by the paper before the Committee or by the clarifications given by the representative of the Director-General that it was possible to specify an amount corresponding to the requirements of this Fund. However, compromises did emerge, and although they might not be entirely logical, it was sometimes necessary to choose the lesser of two evils. He shared the same regret expressed by the representative of the Government of the United States that governments were not to be refunded in accordance with article 18, but he was willing to agree to the compromise solution put forward by the representative of the Government of Denmark.

94. The representative of the Government of the United Kingdom stated that she would normally oppose a recommendation of this sort which was in effect a disguised supplementary budget, and which contained proposals which were not fully justified or costed. However, due to the exceptional circumstances she was prepared to support the expenditure on the items listed under the heading of equipment. She was not convinced that each item had been fully justified and costed, but it did make sense to take this opportunity to replace equipment. Her reservations concerning the transfer of money to the Building and Accommodation Fund remained. There were no firm proposals to support this transfer, and indeed after the discussion on the amount to be transferred her hesitation had been reinforced. It would appear that the original amount of 4 million Swiss francs had not been properly costed or justified if 2 million Swiss francs would now suffice. If expenditure was required on building or accommodation for the Office, then the Committee, the Governing Body and the Conference were prepared to consider properly costed and argued proposals. In the case of the ILO Regional Office for Africa in Abidjan, for example, it was obvious that expenditure on the building was in the interests of the Organisation, and that a return on the investment would be secured within a short period. Concrete proposals of this sort would be considered. On the other hand it was difficult to accept that an arbitrary amount of money should be transferred into the account "just in case". There were already a number of these "just in case" accounts and there was no justification for increasing this Fund at present. She would not ask for a vote, but the Committee should consider seriously whether it wanted to take decisions on financial and other important matters on the basis of arbitrary rather than well-considered arguments.

95. The Chairman reminded the Committee that it should be considering whether or not it accepted the compromise proposed by the representative of the Government of Denmark. There was no point in repeating views already expressed in the earlier discussion and he asked subsequent speakers to indicate their views on the compromise solution under debate.

96. The representative of the Government of Australia disagreed that governments should be denied the opportunity to place on record their reluctance to accept the compromise solution. There was no rationale for either 2 million or 4 million Swiss francs to be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund, and 2 million was only better than 4 million because it was a smaller sum. If there was a clear reason for spending money on buildings then it should be discussed and decided upon in the Governing Body. He accepted the compromise solution proposed by the representative of the Government of Denmark but, given the lack of information, did so with reluctance.

97. The representative of the Government of the Russian Federation stated that his Government had reviewed its previous position concerning the stringent observation of the Financial Regulations after considering the remarks made by the representative of the Government of Germany. Measures should be adopted to improve equipment. Although such expenditure was recurrent and it would be logical to provide the necessary money through the budget, it would be a mistake to believe that all financial decisions were immutable. In this particular case there were good reasons to finance certain kinds of expenditure from the cash surplus. Earlier his Government had supported the position taken by the Chairman, but a new solution had now been proposed, and although his Government did not like it very much it would not hinder its adoption.

98. The representative of the Government of Nigeria believed that the transfer of money to the Building and Accommodation Fund was important. His Government had been paying the rent of the ILO office in Lagos since its transfer from Accra and it would therefore appreciate it if these costs were taken over by the ILO. He believed that 2 million Swiss francs was insufficient and would prefer that the full 4 million Swiss francs or even more be transferred to the Fund. However, since a compromise was being sought he would support it.

99. The representative of the Government of Mexico repeated her support for the original proposal made by the Director-General but indicated that she had no difficulty in agreeing to any compromise solution reached.

100. The Chairman reminded the Committee that the first compromise proposed, which did not have the support of the Employer or Worker members, involved not transferring any funds to the Building and Accommodation Fund. The second compromise, which had met with less opposition, proposed that 2 million Swiss francs be refunded to member States, and 2 million Swiss francs be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund. Although certain governments had expressed their regret or reservations in regard to the second compromise solution, they had also stated that they would not oppose it. That being the case he proposed that the Committee accept the second compromise solution.

101. The Committee recommends that the Governing Body propose to the 79th (1992) Session of the International Labour Conference that, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, the urgent capital equipment purchases itemised in the Appendix (Appendix XII to this Provisional Record) to this report amounting to 10,324,000 Swiss francs together with a transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund of 2 million Swiss francs, be financed from the 1990-91 cash surplus, and that it adopt a resolution in the following terms:

> The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
> Noting that for the 1990-91 biennium an excess of regular budget income over regular budget expenditure has resulted in a cash surplus of 19,369,458 Swiss francs;
> 1. Decides, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, to set aside 10,324,000 Swiss francs of the 1990-91 cash surplus in a special account, to be used for the purpose of financing the purchases of capital equipment itemised in the Appendix to this report, and 2 million Swiss francs to be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund, thereby reducing by corresponding amounts the sum which would otherwise be available for reducing member States' assessed contributions for 1993.
> 2. Notes that, taking account of the above appropriations, the amount available under article 18 of the Financial Regulations for reducing the assessed contributions of member States for 1993 will be 7,045,458 Swiss francs.

[1] Russian Federation – In a letter of 26 December 1991 addressed to the Director-General by the Permanent Mission of the Russian Federation to the United Nations Office and other international organisations in Geneva transmitting a note from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Russian Federation indicated, inter alia, that it "remains responsible in full for all rights and obligations of the USSR in the International Labour Organisation including the financial obligations".

[2] Lao People's Democratic Republic – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 77th Session (1990), the Lao People's Democratic Republic is called upon (a) to pay in full in 1990 its contribution for the 1990 year; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year in which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1989 amounting in total to Sw.frs. 122,568 by the payment of three equal annual instalments of Sw.frs. 40,856 beginning in 1990. The Conference also decided at its 77th Session (1990) that the Lao People's Democratic Republic should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. The Lao People's Democratic Republic has paid its annuities and contributions for 1990 and 1991 and has been credited with its share in the incentive scheme for 1990 of 22 Swiss francs. The arrears of contributions now due from the Lao People's Democratic Republic of Sw.frs. 40,856 represent the balance of its consolidated arrears of contributions to the end of 1989.

[3] Comoros – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 70th Session (1984), the Comoros is called upon: (a) to pay in 1985 its 1985 contribution ($2,737) in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that will have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1984, amounting to $56,739, by the payment of nine equal annual instalments of $5,674 beginning in 1985 and a final instalment of $5,673. The Conference also decided at its 70th Session (1984), under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, that the Comoros should be permitted to vote. The Comoros made a payment ($5,000) on account of its 1985 annuity in 1986. The Comoros failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986. The arrears of contributions now due from Comoros of Sw.frs. 277,440 include Sw.frs. 90,544 due in respect of arrears to the end of 1984 and its contributions from 1985 to 1991 amounting to Sw.frs. 186,896.

[4] Dominican Republic – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 63rd Session (1977), the Dominican Republic is called upon: (a) to pay its current contribution for the year 1977 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1976, amounting to $266,286, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $13,314 beginning in 1977 and a final instalment of $13,320. The Conference at its 65th Session (1979) decided, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution, that the Dominican Republic should be permitted to vote. The Dominican Republic paid its annuities and contributions for 1977 to 1984 inclusive. The Dominican Republic failed to comply with the terms of its arrangement in 1985 and therefore lost the right to vote as from 1 January 1986. The arrears of contributions now due from the Dominican Republic of Sw.frs. 838,639 comprise Sw.frs. 279,603 due in respect of arrears to the end of 1976 and its contributions from 1985 to 1991 of Sw.frs. 559,036.

[5] Paraguay – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 78th Session (1991), Paraguay is called upon (a) to pay in full in 1991 its contribution for the year 1991 together with its contribution due to the Working Capital Fund of the Organisation of Sw.frs. 2,625; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1990, amounting in total to Sw.frs. 1,174,753, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of Sw.frs. 58,738 beginning in 1991 and a final instalment of Sw.frs. 58,731. The Conference also decided at its 78th Session that Paraguay should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Paraguay has paid its contribution to the Working Capital Fund, its annuities and contributions for 1991 and 1992 and has also made a payment of 2,094 Swiss francs on account of its 1993 annuity. Paraguay also owes Sw.frs. 245,066 in respect of contributions to the ILO and other League of Nations organisations for the period prior to 1939. The Conference at its 45th Session (1961) decided that these arrears should be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions due since 5 September 1956, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organisation.

[6] Poland – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 75th Session (1988), Poland is called upon: (a) to pay in 1988 its contribution for the year 1988 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1987, amounting to $9,039,336, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $451,967 beginning in 1988 and a final instalment of $451,963. At its 75th Session (1998) the Conference also decided that Poland should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Poland has paid its annuities and contributions for 1988 and 1992 and thus has the right to vote. The arrears of contributions now due from Poland of Sw.frs. 11,864,127 represent the balance of its consolidated arrears to the end of 1987.

[7] Romania – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 77th Session (1990), Romania is called upon (a) to pay in full in 1990 its contribution for the 1990 year; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year in which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1989 amounting in total to Sw.frs. 2,875,816 by the payment of eight equal annual instalments of Sw.frs. 359,477 beginning in 1990. The Conference also decided at its 77th Session (1990) that Romania should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the ILO Constitution. Romania has paid its annuities and contributions for 1990 and 1991 and has been credited with its share in the incentive scheme for 1990 of 2,094 Swiss francs and thus has the right to vote. The arrears of contributions now due from Romania of Sw.frs. 2,156,862 represent the balance of its consolidated arrears of contributions to the end of 1989.

[8] Chad – In accordance with the arrangement approved by the Conference at its 69th Session (1983), Chad is called upon: (a) to pay in 1983 its contribution for the yeaar 1983 in full; (b) in subsequent years to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due; (c) to settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1982, amounting to $122,107, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of $6,105 beginning in 1984 and a final instalment of $6,112. The Conference also decided at its 69th Session (June 1983) that Chad should be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution. Chad has paid its annuities and contributions for 1984 to 1991 and has been credited with its share in the incentive scheme for 1990 of 308 Swiss francs and thus has the right to vote. The arrears of contributions due from Chad of Sw.frs. 128,216 represent the balance of its consolidated arrears to the end of 1982.

[1] The Republic of Korea became a Member of the United Nations on 17 September 1991 and of the ILO on 9 December 1991. It was assessed in the UN for its period of membership in 1991 at the annual rate of 0.69 per cent and it is being proposed to the 79th Session (June 1992) of the International Labour Conference that it be assessed for the period of its membership in the ILO in 1991 and for the 1992 year at the rate of 0.68 per cent, the difference being due to an arithmetical adjustment for differences in membership between the two organisations.

[2] These rates were formerly assessed on the USSR.

Draft amendments to the Financial Regulations

(Deletions are in square brackets, new text is in italics)

Article 11

4. The Director-General shall set aside in an Incentive Fund to encourage early payment of member States' assessed contributions 60 per cent of all interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in any year for distribution to those member States which have paid in full their assessed contributions by 31 December of that year. The total incentive amount so established in each year will be distributed to eligible member States under an incentive points system which takes into account the dates and amounts of payments of current year's contributions by member States.

5. The Director-General shall distribute any net premium earned on the forward purchasing transactions between US dollars and Swiss francs during a biennium under the Swiss franc assessment system in the following manner: one-half to the Incentive Fund referred to in paragraph 4 above in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 6 below and one-half to member States in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 7 below; the net premium earned being arrived at after allowing for any residual gain or loss on exchange in the same biennium arising from the operation of the Swiss franc assessment system.

6. The one-half share of any net premium distributed to the Incentive Fund shall be credited to those member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full at the end of either the first or second year of the financial period during which the net premium was earned and shall be distributed to each eligible member State in the second year of the next following financial period on the basis of the ratio of the total of the incentive points earned by it during the biennium to the total of the incentive points earned by all eligible member States during the biennium under the incentive points system mentioned in paragraph 4 above.

7. The one-half share of any net premium distributed to member States shall be apportioned among them on the basis of the proportion of the total of each member State's assessed contributions during the biennium in which the net premium was earned to the total of the assessed contributions for the biennium of all member States. The amounts so established shall be used to reduce the contributions of member States in the following way:

(a) member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full during the biennium in which the net premium was earned shall have their share of the net premium deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding biennium;

(b) other member States shall not be credited with their share of the net premium until they have paid in full their assessed contributions for the biennium in which the net premium was earned; when they have done so, their share of the net premium shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next biennium for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

[2. The Working Capital Fund shall be of such amount as may be voted from time to time by the Conference and shall be constituted by:

(a) moneys placed in the Fund by the Members of the Organisation, the amount of the share of each Member being assessed in accordance with the budgetary scale of contributions; and

(b) any sums which the Conference may cause to be paid into it from time to time.

3. The sums paid by Members of the Organisation under paragraph 2(a) for the purpose of constituting or augmenting the Working Capital Fund shall be carried to the credit of the Members which have paid such sums. The sums which the Conference causes to be paid into the Fund from time to time shall be carried to the credit of the Organisation.

4. The Conference may liberate all or part of the sums constituting the Working Capital Fund, and the sums so liberated in so far as they are derived from moneys placed in the Fund under paragraph 2(a) shall be returned to the Members which have contributed to the Fund in proportion to the respective shares in the Fund.

5. Subject to a decision of the Conference, States which for any reason cease to be Members of the Organisation shall be entitled to the reimbursement of the total amount of their shares in the Working Capital Fund under paragraph 2(a).

6. Members joining the Organisation shall contribute to the Working Capital Fund even if such payments would bring the Working Capital Fund above a maximum limit fixed for it by the Conference, provided that the position with regard to the Fund shall be reviewed by the Conference from time to time with a view to determining what adjustment, if any, should be made in the amount of the Fund, having regard to consequent excess over the maximum limit.

1. The Working Capital Fund shall be administered as a separate account. A statement showing the position of the Fund, audited by the external auditor, shall be submitted to the session of the Conference following the close of each financial period. [Payments into the Fund under article 19, paragraph 2(a), shall be made from the budget. As soon as a Member pays its contribution the Working Capital Fund account shall be immediately credited with a portion of the contributions corresponding to the ratio between the appropriation in respect of the Working Capital Fund for the financial period and the total appropriations for the financial period.]

1. (a) Sums [not exceeding the total shares in the Fund of the Members of the Organisation] may be withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund to finance budgetary expenditure for any [calendar year] financial period pending receipt of contributions or other income, and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body, and shall be reimbursed to the Fund in the course of the same [year] financial period as soon as income from contributions or other income is available for this purpose.

(b) Should the [sums contributed to the] Working Capital Fund [by Members] be temporarily inadequate to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body, [advances may be made from that part of the Working Capital Fund which stands to the credit of the Organisation. Such advances shall be reimbursed to the Fund as soon as receipts from contributions or other income are available. Such advances shall also be reported to the Governing Body at the session following the making of an advance. Should the Working Capital Fund as a whole be temporarily inadequate to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body,] the Director-General may contract loans or advances for such sums as may be necessary pending the receipt of contributions. The amounts borrowed shall be reimbursed as soon as possible from the subsequent receipts of contributions or other income. Such borrowings shall be reported to the Governing Body at the session following the contracting of a loan or advance.

2. If [in] any [calendar year] sums withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund or borrowed to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions or other income and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body cannot be reimbursed in the course of the same [year] financial period owing to the fact that the total budgetary income for [that year] the period falls short of total authorised expenditure incurred during the [year] period, the sums so borrowed or withdrawn shall be reimbursed to the lender or lenders and to the Fund in the second year of the next following [the year of such withdrawal] financial period by adding to the contributions assessed on member States for that year an additional assessment in Swiss francs equivalent to the amount so borrowed or withdrawn: provided that temporary surpluses of budgetary income over expenditure occurring at any time shall be utilised to the extent possible to reduce the amount of outstanding loans or advances.

REPORTS OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE

FIRST REPORT

A. MATTERS REPORTED TO THE CONFERENCE AT ITS SECOND SITTING

The Conference was informed orally at its second sitting yesterday of the following decisions and recommendations of the Selection Committee.

Election of the Officers of the Committee

The Selection Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. A. Ali (Government member, Bangladesh)

Employers' Vice-Chairman: Mr. M'Kaissi (Employers' member, Tunisia)

Workers' Vice-Chairman: Mrs. Carr (Workers' member, Canada)

Setting up of Conference committees

The Selection Committee recommended that the Conference should set up the following committees:

Finance Committee
Committee on the Application of Standards
Committee on Workers' Claims
Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters
Committee on Human Resources
Committee on Apartheid
Resolutions Committee
Standing Orders Committee

Composition of Conference committees

Proposals were submitted orally to the Selection Committee that the Conference committees should be composed as follows:

Finance Committee: 1 Government representative of each member State represented at the Conference;

Committee on the Application of Standards: 166 members (76 Government members, 32 Employers' members and 58 Workers' members);

Committee on Workers' Claims: 157 members (61 Government members, 48 Employers' members and 48 Workers' members).

Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters: 131 members (56 Government members, 35 Employers' members and 40 Workers' members).

Committee on Human Resources: 134 members (54 Government members, 41 Employers' members and 39 Workers' members).

Resolutions Committee: 158 members (66 Government members, 43 Employers' members and 49 Workers' members).

Standing Orders Committee: 38 members (23 Government members, 4 Employers' members and 11 Workers' members).

The Selection Committee noted that, in accordance with the usual practice, a system of weighting would be applied in each committee to ensure equality of voting strength between the three groups.

The lists of the members of the Conference committees are appended to the present report. These lists also take account of changes in the composition of committees that have occurred since the second sitting of the Conference.

Committee on Apartheid

In accordance with the established practice, the Selection Committee recommended to the Conference that the Committee on Apartheid should, as at previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from each group and should meet for a maximum of six sittings.

Discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

(a) The Selection Committee decided that the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General would begin yesterday afternoon, Wednesday, 3 June and decided that the list of speakers would be closed on Thursday, 11 June at 12 noon, under the usual conditions.

(b) At its 248th Session the Governing Body decided, in the course of its consideration of possible reforms in the functioning of the International Labour Conference, to recommend the Conference to reduce the time-limit for speeches provided for in Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Conference Standing Orders from 15 to ten minutes on a trial basis as from the 78th (1991) Session of the Conference. Following this successful experiment, at its 252nd Session the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference at its present session that it amend Article 14, paragraph 6 of its Standing Orders so as to confirm this reduction, on the understanding that, pending the approval of the amendment by the Conference at its present session, the practice adopted at its 78th (1991) Session should continue. The Selection Committee accordingly invited the President of the Conference, after consulting the Vice-Presidents in accordance with Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Conference Standing Orders, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate the recommendation of the Governing Body to reduce the time-limit for speeches provided for in that article from 15 to ten minutes.

Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

In the plenary sittings a vote is not valid if the number of votes cast for and against is less than half the number of the delegates attending the Conference and entitled to vote. If there is no quorum on a show of hands, a record vote may have to be taken and this wastes much time.

Over the years, the Governing Body has made a number of recommendations to improve the working of the quorum rule, and it is the practice of the Selection Committee to invite the Conference each year to confirm a number of principles based on those recommendations to ensure the satisfactory working of the quorum rule.

The Selection Committee accordingly invited the Conference to confirm the following principles:

(i) the quorum will be fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the session. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee, in the exercise of its functions under Article 20, paragraph 1(2) of the Standing Orders, determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;

(ii) once the quorum has been determined on the basis of registrations, the usual practice of adjusting it, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account, on the one hand, new registrations and, on the other, notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference, will continue as in the past;

(iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;

(iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until the end, since important votes often take place on the last day;

(v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;

(vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;

(vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

In arranging the programme of work of the Conference, the Selection Committee will endeavour to ensure that matters which require the holding of votes come before the Conference at the earliest possible moment. The plan of work for Committees endorsed by the Selection Committee takes this requirement into account.

(b) Punctuality

As in previous years, the Selection Committee recommended the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually - except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions - irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, it is the practice for representatives of each group to meet with the chairman and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallised.

The Selection Committee recommended the Officers of the Conference committees to continue the above-mentioned practice.

Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under Article 13.4 of the Constitution of the ILO, having regard to the recent increase in the number of States in this position. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under Article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes among the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by Article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body noted that, in order to avoid such distortions, the practice had been followed by members of the Government group at the 73rd and 74th Sessions of the Conference in 1987 of not applying for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that this practice should be continued, and that, should it for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote. It reconfirmed this principle again at its 241st Session (November 1988), and the practice has been maintained at all subsequent sessions of the Conference.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommended to the Conference that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a plan of work for committees, which is not binding but will enable them, in organising their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is appended in tabular form for the information of the Conference.

Appointment of members of the Appeals Board panel

At its 43rd Session (1959), the Conference adopted proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of committees.

In accordance with section III, paragraph 5(a) of those proposals, the Governing Body is required to recommend a panel of five persons of internationally recognised independence and impartiality for appointment by the Conference and from which, prior to every session of the Conference, the Governing Body appoints an Appeals Board of three persons.

The Selection Committee transmitted the following proposals of the Governing Body to the Conference:

- to reappoint to the panel from which the members of the Conference Appeals Board are selected, for a further period of three years expiring on 30 June 1995, Mr. Abi Saab (Egypt), Mr. Calero Rodrigues (Brazil) and Mr. Cottafavi (Italy);

- to appoint to the same panel, for a period of three years as from June 1992, Mr. Winfrid Haase (Germany).

The Employers' members took no part in the decision on this matter.

Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

In accordance with Article 56, paragraph 9 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Selection Committee recommended to the Conference that the following organizations be invited to be represented in the committees stated:

The Selection Committee took note that the Governing Body had authorised the Director-General to inform the organizations concerned that they may nominate one person only for each agenda item in respect of which their interest has been recognised by the Selection Committee.

B. MATTERS REPORTED TO THE CONFERENCE AT ITS FOURTH SITTING

The Selection Committee now submits to the Conference the following decisions and recommendations.

Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member:	Mr. Pérez del Castillo (Uruguay)
Employers' member:	Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina)
Workers' member:	Mr. Gray (United States)

Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of Article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference
The Secretary-General of the Conference
Mr. Maupain, Legal Adviser of the Conference
Mr. Bartolomei de la Cruz, Director of the International Labour Standards Department
Mrs. Kellerson, Assistant to the Legal Adviser of the Conference

Consideration of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories

On the basis of proposals submitted to it by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee decided to convene a special sitting for the discussion of the Appendix to the Director-General's Report dealing with the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, it being understood that speakers would have to confine their remarks at that sitting to this Appendix and that, conversely, that subject would not be discussed in the framework of the discussion on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the special sitting should be held in the afternoon of Tuesday, 16 June.

In addition, the Selection Committee recommends the Conference to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in that sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the remainder of the Report.

It should be recalled in this connection that, according to Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the time-limit for speeches is a matter for the Conference to decide on the proposal of its Officers. In view of experience at the special sittings held during the 77th (1990) and 78th (1991) Sessions of the Conference, and in particular of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor, the Selection Committee invites the President, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate a proposal concerning the duration of speeches in the special sitting, taking due account of the number of speakers registered. For this purpose the Selection Committee decided that the list of speakers for the special sitting will be closed at 6 pm on Friday, 12 June.

The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intended to devote a part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of his Report to drawing lessons from the special sitting.

Lastly, the Selection Committee decided that the following committees should not meet at the same time as the special sitting: Finance Committee, Resolutions Committee, Committee on Apartheid.

Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO: interim procedural reform

At its 252nd Session the Governing Body approved a number of reforms in the procedure of regional conferences, based on the conclusions drawn from the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference (Bangkok, November-December 1991) regarding the timetable and procedures. The reforms proposed are summarized in the following draft resolution, which the Governing Body decided to propose to the Conference at its present session:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

> Recalling that, in the light of the reforms introduced on an experimental basis at the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference to reduce the length and cost of regional conferences provided for in the 1992-93 budget, the Governing Body has decided that it is necessary to introduce certain other changes for the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation and that, pending revision of the Rules concerning the Powers, Functions and Procedure of Regional Conferences Convened by the International Labour Organisation, authority should be given to the said Conference to derogate from them, as required, to implement these changes on an experimental basis before deciding on a possible revision of the above-mentioned Rules;

Hereby authorizes the Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation, by way of derogation from the applicable Rules,

(a) to consider the business carried out at preliminary group meetings preceding the formal opening of the Conference as having been carried out in official group meetings;

(b) to dispense with the appointment of a Selection Committee and entrust its functions (except in respect of resolutions for which a Resolutions Committee may be appointed under article 13, paragraph 3 of the Rules) to the Officers of the Conference;

(c) to limit the composition of the Resolutions Committee to not more than five members from each group;

(d) to authorize, in case of need, any drafting subcommittee or other subsidiary body set up by a committee of the Conference to report direct to the plenary of the Conference instead of through the Committee;

(e) to suspend the requirement that reports on technical items on the agenda be dispatched by the Office so as to reach governments at least three months before the opening of the Conference if any such report is included in a single volume with other reports of the Director-General, which would thus be required to reach governments two months beforehand;

(f) to reduce the time-limit for addresses to the Conference from 15 to ten minutes.

As this resolution has already been examined in detail by the Standing Orders Committee of the Governing Body and by the Governing Body itself, the Selection Committee refers it direct to the Conference for adoption.

Geneva, 3 June 1992.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

First sitting

Wednesday, 3 June 1992, 9.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Chotard, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Original – French: Mr. CHOTARD (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – As Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, I have the honour to declare open the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I should like to take this opportunity to extend greetings to all delegates, and in particular to the representatives of the countries which joined our Organisation since the last session of the Conference, in other words, the representatives of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Republic of Korea, Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, and Slovenia. This session is opening under the double emblem of continuity and timeliness. Continuity with the usual committees, the drafting of new Conventions, the arrival of dozens of ministers and the presence of an eminent personality: in short, the prospect of fruitful discussions in this always prestigious context into which annually we inject new life.

But this year our discussions, and particularly the discussion of the Director-General's Report, are particularly timely. In fact, for a number of years now the events which have shaken the world have led us once again to reconsider the objectives of the ILO. A similar review had already been undertaken in 1987 by the High-Level Meeting which allowed us to highlight the specific role to be played by international social organisations as the counterpart par excellence of the financial and economic bodies engaged in development efforts. The dismanting of the Berlin Wall endowed our self-review with a historic dimension, and at the same time led to a broad unanimity which the Organisation had never before experienced. Under the impetus of the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, our review was extended through the invitation last year of the Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, Mr. Michel Camdessus, as guest of honour. And finally, in March of this year, the Director-General submitted proposals to the the Governing Body which allowed us to define the ILO's priorities for the next few years. And that is what makes for the timeliness of this session of the Conference. There are three priorities. The first, which is the subject of the Director-General's Report, is to set forth the specific role of the ILO in the process of democratisation upon which many countries have embarked and in respect of which all countries must remain vigilant. This specific role is to recall that social dialogue is the vital complement to political democracy, and that this dialogue requires independent partners and public authorities that respect their independence. If social dialogue leads to organised tripartism, the situation becomes even clearer, but there are many roads to social dialogue and tripartism. The second priority is the reaffirmation of our constant objective of combating poverty. Here again, there is a specific role, namely, the attention given to all problems of employment and, particularly as regards countries that must undertake difficult economic reforms, specific measures to make reconversion easier. As for the third priority, is it also in keeping with one of the ILO's long-standing objectives, namely, the comprehensive protection of workers, particularly by guaranteeing minimum levels of social security when the economic situation does not allow for something better. To one extent or another, these three priorities are relevant to all countries, depending on their situation, but no country can afford to neglect the importance of social justice. The ILO's priorities are clearest in respect of countries which are courageously trying to reform their economies, and particularly in respect of those that have to obey the rules laid down by the international community. Recently in Latin America I was able to see that the ILO seems, in fact, to serve as an effective counterweight to the sacrifices requested by the IMF.

In all developing countries the ILO's action is sought in order to provide a balance between economic and social interests. As for the industrialised countries, they may have more room for manoeuvre but they are not beyond our concern, for they also need social dialogue and, in many cases, their social security systems are in a state of crisis. This situation closely corresponds to the universal vocation of the International Labour Organisation. Social justice is an objective, a treasure to be sought by all nations. Special situations, regional groupings such as the European Community, can provide a context for useful action, but universality remains the foundation of the Organisation, just as tripartism is its method of organisation. Thus, the timeliness of the ILO's message and of its priorities cannot but strengthen our will to act together.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT

Original – French: Mr. CHOTARD (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – The next item on the agenda is the election of the President of this session of the Conference. The candidate will be proposed by Mr. Ramond, Government delegate of France, on behalf of the countries of Western Europe to whom I give the floor.

Original – French: Mr. RAMOND (Government delegate, France) – On behalf of the Western European countries and also of my own country, it is my honour and pleasure to be able to propose the candidature of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues.

If I were to describe an ideal Conference President, the description would certainly fit Mr. Nascimento Rodriguer. In effect, to be a good President you must know your organisation.

Our candidate was a member of the ILO Governing Body for four years as the head of the Portuguese delegation. You have to be an eminent personality. Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues was Minister of Labour a number of times in his own country. You have to have a broad knowledge of tripartism. The candidate contributed to the creation of the General Union of Workers (UGT). He is still the Chairman of the Economic and Social Council. Consequently, he has had experience of the structure of our Organisation in his own country. Lastly, a large measure of farsightedness is certainly necessary to preside over this vast assembly.

Our candidate is an eminent academic with numerous publications to his name which will enable him to distance himself sufficiently to be able to deal with all the issues to be discussed here. His farsightedness will help him to preside over the Conference and to tackle any problems that may arise. I have no doubt that his candidature will be accepted and I am delighted at this prospect.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – On behalf of the Employers' group in its entirety, I would like to support the candidature of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues as President of this session of the Conference.

We are very pleased to do this for three reasons. Firstly, because he is the representative of Portugal, a country which is a democratic one, a European one, open to the world because of its history and geography. We are happy that a representative of Portugal should hold this exalted office.

We would also like to support his candidature for all the reasons given by the spokesman of the European Governments and in the light of his brilliant and political, trade union and university career.

We are happy to have at the helm of this session of the Conference a person who is very familiar with our Organisation because he is our colleague in the Governing Body of the ILO.

We are convinced that Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues will be an excellent President and we would commend his election to you.

Mrs. CARR (Workers' delegate, Canada) – It is indeed a great pleasure for me on behalf of the workers from all around the world that are here to second the nomination of Mr. Rodrigues, the President of the Economic and Social Council of Portugal, a country that the workers know well and we are proud of the distinguished career of the person that we are talking about now who comes from that country. He certainly knows the Governing Body and on that basis those qualifications will stand him in good stead as he proceeds to the functions and the workings of this Conference. He himself has had a very distinguished career which is too long for me to say anything about it this moment, but I want to assure you that we support the nomination and we look forward to working with him over the next few weeks.

Original – Russian: Mr. EVLYUKHIN (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – It is a great pleasure for me on behalf of the group of countries of Central and Eastern Europe to be able to support the candidature of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to the exalted post of President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The work and high qualifications of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues in the field of labour are well known in this country and abroad. As representative of the Portuguese Government on the Governing Body he made a significant contribution to our Organisation. I would like to express my assurance that the election of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to the post of President of this session of the Conference will contribute to the success of this important international gathering.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MATOUG (Secretary, People's General Committee for Vocational Training and Formation, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – It is a pleasure for me on behalf of the African group to stand before you today to second the nomination of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, the President of the Economic and Social Council of Portugal, to preside over this 79th Session of the Conference. We know very well that Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues is experienced in working with the ILO. He was born in Africa, in Angola, a country with which Portugal has very close and historic ties. This is why we believe that he has a great deal of legal and historic experience and qualifications, and is quite able to direct the work of this Conference. We also second his nomination because he has worked with the International Labour Organisation to implement the programme of co-operation with Portuguese-speaking African countries. He is conscious of the importance of tripartism, which is the basic structure of this Organisation. We are quite sure that he is capable of directing this Conference and of achieving the desired aims and results, especially at a time when the world is witnessing very serious and drastic economic and social changes.

The Report of the Director-General reflects these drastic changes, and especially the transition towards democracy. The time is right to nominate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to the presidency of this Conference to achieve this aim.

I would like to assure our elected President that the African group will stand beside him, support him and co-operate with him in his work to guarantee the desired aims of this Conference.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. DA COSTA (Government delegate, Angola) – The Angolan delegation, on behalf of the five Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa, is delighted to be able to second the candidacy of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to the presidency of this session of the Conference. He has had a brilliant professional and political career. He has represented the trade unions, he has been a member of the Portuguese delegation at various sessions of the International Labour Conference and has always been an ardent defender of tripartism. His career recently reached a climax with his election to the post of President of the Social and Economic Council in Portugal, having already served as Minister in Portugal. His experience in labour relations and in the running of Conferences is a sure guarantee that he will be an excellent President.

The Angolan delegation, on behalf of the five Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa, would like to express the wish for the success of this session of the Conference under his presidency.

Original – Spanish: Mr. VARGAS CAMPOS (Government delegate, Mexico) – On behalf of the countries of the Americas it is my honour to support the nomination of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues as the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The countries of the Americas have certainly noted his brilliant career – former Minister of Labour in Portugal, a member of Parliament – where he chaired the Social and Labour Affairs Committee and subsequently became the Portuguese representative on the Governing Body of the ILO and currently is President of the recently created Economic and Social Council in Portugal. His experience in labour affairs and more particularly his dedication to the cause of the trade union movement, tripartism and social harmony are a guarantee of his ability to perform the job as President of the International Labour Conference and I have no doubt that it will guarantee the success of the Conference and the items on the agenda.

For all these reasons the countries of the Americas firmly support this nomination.

Original – Farsi: Mr. KAMALI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. It is my pleasure on behalf of the Asian and Pacific region to support the nomination of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, the President of the Economic and Social Council of Portugal, for the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, it should be added, is very well qualified for this high office. Our confidence in his presidency is based on his considerable experiences both as a Minister of Labour and a parliamentarian. He has also had numerous other positions in the fields of labour and social affairs, as well as international relations. He is particularly familiar with the work of our Organisation and this august assembly.

In view of his qualities, we are convinced that Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues will conduct the leadership of this Conference efficiently and his presidency will further the co-operation and dialogue among the social partners as well as the member States. We would like to assure Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues of the support of the Asian and Pacific region in bringing this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion.

Mr. AL JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, it is a great pleasure for me to speak on behalf of the group of Arab countries which is chaired by Mr. Matoug, the Secretary of the People's General Committee for Vocational Training and Formation in the Libyan Arab Jamahariya, to second the nomination of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, the President of the Economic and Social Council of Portugal as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The support of the Arab group is a reflection of our deep satisfaction as to the high qualifications and experience of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues in the field of labour and social affairs. He is a personality of high calibre; and he is of Portuguese origin. Portugal has very strong ties – both friendly and historic – with the Arab countries as well as a history of co-operation. The group of Arab countries in its tripartite structure appreciated the distinguished role of Portugal when it presided over the European Community and attempted to consolidate and strengthen the relationship between Europe and Arabs for the achievement of the common interests of both European and Arab countries – especially those in the Mediterranean basin. Indeed, we share a common history and geography. We would like to repeat our suppor for this nomination and assure Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues that we will fully co-operate with him so as to guarantee the success of this Conference and the achievement of its aims.

Mr. CHOTARD (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, the President of the Economic and Social Council of Portugal, has been nominated to preside over the 79th Session, and his nomination has been duly seconded. In the absence of any other candidatures, I declare Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues unanimously elected as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and request him to take the President's chair.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT (Mr. NASCIMENTO RODRIGUES) – Mr. Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, Mr. Secretary-General of the International Labour Conference, Excellencies, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen: It is a great honour for my country, for the Portuguese Government and for myself to have been elected to serve in the high office of President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to express my appreciation to all of you for this election. I should also like to pay tribute to the eminent figures who on behalf of the various groups and regions represented in our Organisation were kind enough to come to the rostrum and speak in support of my nomination.

I should also like to welcome all of the new member States and to express my wish for the peace and happiness of their peoples.

I cannot hide the fact that I feel an enormous responsibility at this moment. I come from a very ancient country of Europe which has a secular national identity that was forged in the coming together of other civilisations and by the dialogue between other cultures, whose values were largely accepted and adopted by the Portuguese people. Will I be able at this time to transmit to you all the message of the essential unity of mankind, to speak to you in the language of understanding, to express to you my concern and, at the same time, to express to you my hopes for a better future?

As we approach the end of this century it is disturbing to step back and take stock of the situation of mankind. In addition to the longstanding and very serious problems of hunger, unemployment, underdevelopment and discrimination, we are now facing the new and no less serious problems which also require a solution.

We are ever more aware of the fact that our planet is being seriously affected by tremendous ecological imbalances which threaten all species and we are also more aware of the fact that the startling advances of science and technology can also be used as a means of genetic manipulation, the consequences of which are incalculable. All of us also understand that scourges such as drug trafficking, AIDS and such phenomena as unbridled urbanisation are a serious threat to the quality of life and the future of mankind, beginning with the young people who are the guarantee of our future, as well as the elderly, who are sometimes afflicted by the loneliness arising from the loss of family ethics or in other cases by the lack of minimum social protection.

At a time when we have ended the major ideological confrontation of the post-war period and stand on the ruins of the totalitarian experiments, a tremendous breath of hope of freedom has come as a harbinger of the new century.

But what are we seeing here on this ancient continent where we hold our annual Conference? We see the outbreak of localised wars. These are no less cruel with their train of death, of wandering refugees, of children struck by the tragedy of the lack of love. And we see many other manifestations of xenophobia, reactions of intolerance and a move towards centralising egotisms which could bring about further convulsions. Are these not inescapeable signs of serious and deep imbalances in many of our societies?

I am not a pessimist. On the contrary, never before has the world had as many opportunities to create the conditions, to enable man to achieve full dignity, whether in Central and Eastern Europe and Africa, Asia, Latin America, just as before, in southern Europe, millions of people achieved their freedom. I am convinced that the existing remnants of dictatorial regimes, rather than being any evidence to the contrary, are simply regimes whose days are numbered. To be free is stamped on the soul of mankind and the inevitable increase in the movement of ideas, people and goods, and the circulation of images and voices made possible by new technologies are going to break this darkness and awaken an even greater desire to achieve peace, freedom and justice.

It is true that democracy is gaining ground. But democracy does not mean just a lack of dictatorship. The freedoms involved are real and not just caricatures when they are exercised in a State based on the rule of law, which means the reign of law and a policy to justice.

Moreover, popular sovereignty is more than just a periodical democratic exercise of a universal and secret vote. Parliamentary democracy and multi-party systems must be associated with participatory democracy, which means free expression and the coordination of the various collective interests that arise from social life. In society one is not just a citizen who votes; one is also a worker or employer, a scientist or a farmer, a producer or a consumer, a young person or the father of a family. So it is quite legitimate and spontaneous that people should wish to join together in representative organisations to defend their specific interests.

Tripartism, which historically and in a very unique fashion created the image and framework of the work of the ILO, is a clear expression of political democracy, and the most enduring manifestation of participatory democracy. As one can see from the excellent Report by the Director-General, tripartism is the transposition into social relations of the fundamental principles of political democracy, that is, freedom, pluralism, participation by the persons concerned in the decisions that affect them.

Naturally we cannot talk about tripartism where there are no organisations of trade unions and employers which are free, independent, strong and representative. To give specific content to all the rights of freedom of association enshrined in the longstanding, but still timely and relevant Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), is to stimulate democracy and tripartism.

History has shown us how trade unionism was, on many occasions, a bulwark of freedom and a driving force for social justice. There have been steps both forwards and backwards during all this time, tremendous adversity, and many victories. But today as in the past and in the future, political, economic and social changes are going to require adaptation and will result in periods of uncertainty. Even in the most developed market economies where a recognition of the role of trade organisations as social partners has long been well established there is talk of a "crisis of trade unionism", and some even speak of its progressive demise.

It is a fact that the great economic changes, technological innovation, labour migrations, new values and means of productive organisation, as well as social behaviour, have changed the labour market. All this has led in some cases to the loss of union membership, and in other cases to an ongoing situation of weakness in the union movement.

I am not, however, of the opinion that we can speak of a crisis in the trade union movement. I think it is rather more appropriate simply to note that the trade unions, as is the case with other social bodies, have had to face up to new problems and very serious emergencies, and they need time to adjust to this situation and find ways to innovate and must be promoted.

It it always important, in any case, that the trade union should be truly independent both of the State and of other organisations of a different nature and function. Only in this way can they increase their credibility and win the support of the broadest range of workers, and more particularly of young people, who are always open to the great causes of freedom and justice, because it is important for the future of democracy to involve them from early on in the decisive exercise and use of their own democracy.

These difficulties of establishment, growth and representativity are not confined only to the workers. Employers too are facing new obstacles which have arisen from diversification of economic structures, the dissemination of production units, the need for technical modernisation as well as changes in management methods and the search for markets. However, the employers' organisations are also vital parts in the workings of democracy. They are interlocutors that cannot be replaced in collective and tripartite social cooperation, essential poles in society, for disseminating the spirit of free entrepreneurism and the sense of the social dimension which a healthy and open economy must both possess and engender.

A democratic State, in turn, must guarantee freedom of association and the right to free collective bargaining, both in law and in fact. The role for labour legislation and the role for free collective bargaining of labour conditions depend much on national traditions of each system of social regulation, and also to some extent on the economic situation. There is no single remedy or recipe in this respect, but the principle that the State should leave the broadest possible role for bilateral negotiations is one which welcome, whatever the level at which this takes place. And it is also apparent that as the degree of collective autonomy increases and the sense of responsibility both from the union and the employers' sides becomes more visible, bipartite social cooperation will win ground and be upheld at the end of the day.

In this light I would like to remind you of the recent Treaty on European Union which was signed by the Member States of the European Community which has as an express objective the development of social dialogue and welcomes the establishment of agreements between the European social partners. This goes beyond the scope of national borders and is a recognition of how important social negotiation is along the lines of those always upheld by the ILO. Collective bargaining and tripartite social cooperation are not however simple methods; they do not come to fruition rapidly and there is no one uniform model; they depend on many very complex, delicate factors and therefore they may take different forms and proceed at different speeds.

However, democracy is and has always been a system which is very slow, painful and difficult to build. It is never ever fully conquered, only won over through tolerance, dialogue and an ongoing effort to seek understanding and common solutions.

This is also true for tripartite cooperation. Here, each side has its own role, its own status and its own institutional personality. More particularly, in terms of the choices concerning the major macroeconomic and macro-social decisions which give more specific shape to the daily life of mankind, tripartite cooperation agreements can constitute the best starting point from which to bring about the necessary changes without any social upheaval. There is no advantage to be won from delaying or blocking socio-economic changes because in the long term the costs will be only greater. However, agreements must be reached on the changes which are deemed to be necessary. And, if these understandings can take shape between governments, unions and the employers, then this will re-establish a balance, restore collective confidence and provide a decisive impetus to development.

I am well aware that it is easier to say all this than to put these ideas into practice in situations which are complex and vary enormously. We have no magic wand which will miraculously take us over the enormous barriers which have arisen and which still impede the development of freedom and the healthy growth of the market economy as well as the dissemination of social justice.

However, if we do not believe in man's ability, in what then will we believe? And I am speaking here not of man in the abstract but of man in practice whose essential dignity remains unaltered wherever and whoever he is, be he poor or rich, educated or illiterate, religious or atheist, man or woman.

This dignity can be attained only through the full respect for the rights of man and these are not just political rights, but also cultural, economic and social. In order to achieve and implement such rights tripartism had in the past and still has today an essential contribution to make.

Furthermore, in the society of today, riven as it is by many sectoral interests and crossed by a multifaceted chain of social actors, the rationale of interdependence and solidarity of interests must overcome the force of statism and the fierce conflict of selfish behaviour which will prevent harmonious and fair progress.

Allow me therefore to conclude by restating my firm conviction that democracy is not a luxury item to be consumed by the rich countries. Every man and all men have the right to freedom and to social justice. Where these exist, then there will be peace in the conscience of mankind. And until they reign throughout the world we cannot remain indifferent.

Election of the Vice-Presidents

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Let us now move on to the second item of the agenda, which is the election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference. We have a derogation to Article 25 (4) of the Standing Orders of the Conference and, as the groups met yesterday, we are going to move to the election of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference without adjourning the session.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections may I consider that these nominations have been adopted by the Conference? We are now going to suspend our meeting for one hour during which time the Selection Committee will meet here in this same room.

(The Conference adjourned at 10.15 a.m.)

(The Conference resumed at 11.30 a.m.)

First report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We shall resume our discussions with the next agenda item, which is the report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Ali, Government delegate of Bangladesh and Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report of the Committee.

Mr. ALI (Government delegate, Bangladesh; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference an oral report on the substantive decisions that the Selection Committee has just taken. They will be published in the Provisional Record tomorrow together with the report on the meeting that the Committee is to hold at 6 p.m. today as the first report of the Selection Committee.

First, the Committee elected its Officers and considered proposals regarding the setting up of Conference committees. It recommends that, in addition to the Finance Committee and the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Conference should constitute the following committees to deal with the items on the Conference agenda: Committee on Workers' Claims; Committee on the Prevention of Industrial Disasters; Committee on Human Resources; Standing Orders Committee. The Selection Committee also considered the numerical composition of the committees which it recommends to be set up on the basis of its list provided by the secretariat of the Conference. As regards the Committee on Apartheid, in accordance with the established practice, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the Committee on Apartheid should, as at previous sessions, be composed of a maximum of 20 members from this group and should meet for a maximum of six sittings. The Committee has decided that the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General should begin today (3 June) and that the list of speakers for the discussion should be closed on Thursday, 11 June, at 12 noon.

The Conference will recall that last year, on a recommendation by the Governing Body, the Conference decided to reduce the time-limit for speeches in the plenary sitting from 15 to ten minutes. This year there is a formal recommendation by the Governing Body before the Conference, to be considered by the Standing Orders Committee, to amend the Standing Orders so as to reduce the time-limit officially to ten minutes. Pending the adoption of this amendment, the Selection Committee accordingly invites the President of the Conference, after consulting the Vice-Presidents, in accordance with Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, to submit to the Conference for decision without debate the recommendation of the Governing Body to reduce the time-limit for speeches provided for in that article from 15 to ten minutes. The Selection Committee also makes a number of suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference which concern the quorum rule, punctuality and the negotiations in committees. I will not read them out here, but I should like to call the attention of the members of the Conference to all these items when they read the report tomorrow. As regards participation in Conference committees by members who have lost their right to vote, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the practice followed in the past few years by Government members of not applying for regular membership of committees, if they are not at the time entitled to vote, should continue. The Selection Committee also recommends to the Conference that should this practice for any reason not be fully respected the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote. The Committee endorsed a plan of work for the Conference committees which, although not binding, will enable the committees to organise their work so as to take the maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. This plan of work will be appended to its reports. The Selection Committee also transmits two proposals of the Governing Body to the Conference concerning the Appeals Board Panel. They are: to reappoint to the Panel, from which the members of the Conference Appeals Board are selected, for a further period of three years, expiring 30 June 1995: Mr. Arbesser-Rastburg, Mr. Rodrigues and Mr. Cottafavi; and to appoint to the same Panel for a period of three years as from June 1992 Mr. Haase. The Employer members of the Selection Committee took no part in the decision on this matter.

In another recommendation of the Committee, the Committee proposes that certain non-governmental international organisations should be invited to be represented in some of the committees. Again, I will not read them out but the list will appear in the report tomorrow. On the basis of this oral presentation, I invite the Conference to adopt the report of the Selection Committee.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, can I take it that the report of the Selection Committee is approved? It stands approved.

(The Conference adjourned at 11.50 a.m.)

Second sitting

Wednesday, 3 June 1992, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

COMMUNICATION FROM THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Before we processed to the next item on our agenda, I would like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to read a letter received from the European Community.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The President of the Conference has received a letter from the presidency of the European Communities which I will read to you. This letter is dated 2 June 1992.

> Mr. President,
> The European Community and its member States have taken note of the declaration of the representatives of the peoples of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro dated 27 April 1992, according to which the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia constitutes "the State, the international political and juridical personality of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia." This declaration raises certain questions which are being considered in connection with the continuity of Yugoslavia in its capacity as a member of the international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation. Indeed, the European Community and its member States have not accepted the automatic continuity of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the international organisations, including the United Nations.
> In these circumstances, the European Community and its member States reserve their position on this question.
> We therefore consider that the participation of this delegation in the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference shall not prejudice decisions which the European Community and its member States may subsequently take on this question and questions related thereto.
>
> The Community and its member States continue to monitor carefully the events which are taking place in the territory of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.
> They welcome resolution 757 of the Security Council of the United Nations dated 30 May 1992.
> The Community and its member States express the hope that the measures adopted by the international community will prompt the parties directly responsible to embark resolutely on the course of peace.
> I would like to request you to bring the contents of this letter to the knowledge of the Conference at the opening of its present session.

The letter is signed by Mr. Zozimo da Silva, Ambassador of Portugal.

SUBMISSION OF THE ANNUAL REPORT OF THE GOVERNING BODY TO THE CONFERENCE BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE GOVERNING BODY

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on this afternoon's agenda is the presentation of the annual report of the Governing Body to the Conference.

I call on Mr. Chotard, Chairman of the Governing Body, to submit the report.

Original – French: Mr. CHOTARD (Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office) – In my capacity as Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, I have the honour and the pleasure of presenting you with the annual report submitted by the Governing Body to the Conference. This report presents the work done by the Governing Body at the resumption of the 250th Session immediately after the Conference in June 1991, as well as at the 251st and 252nd Sessions held in November 1991 and in February-March 1992 respectively.

As the first part of the 253rd Session which preceded this session of the Conference, ended just a few days ago, the printed report before you in Provisional Record No. 3 could not contain an account of the latest deliberations of the Governing Body and I will therefore complete it orally now by informing you of the main decisions taken on that occasion. But before I report to you in detail about this work please allow me to speak briefly about some major events which have affected the International Labour Organisation just recently.

The first salient fact to which I would like to refer is the spectacular growth of the number of member States of the ILO. After decades during which the number of members of our Organisation remained relatively stable, eight new States have just joined the ILO in a period of less than a year and it is most likely that some other States will also soon be joining the great tripartite family of the ILO. This increase strengthen the universality of our Organisation which is very auspicious, but at ther same time it raises great challenges for this Organisation because in many cases it will prove necessary to help these States to build efficient tripartite structures and economic and social programmes to enable them to implement the principles and standards of the ILO.

This naturally brings me to the subject of the impact of the standard-setting action of the ILO. Ever since its creation in 1919, the ILO has equipped itself with a legal arsenal of 172 international labour Conventions, for which there have been over 5,500 ratifications throughout the world, and 179 Recommendations, which together constitute what we usually call the International Labour Code. The supervisory machinery set up by the ILO, whether it be the regular monitoring carried out by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, whose report is the basis each year for the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the Conference, or the consideration of complaints concerning the violation of trade union rights by the Committee on Freedom of Association, or recourse to the special procedures under articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution, is intended to guarantee the effective application of the principles set out in ILO standards. As a result of on-going and patient dialogue between the supervisory bodies and governments we have seen progress made from year to year in the application of international labour standards in the different regions of the world. Of course it is still necessary for many member States, particularly the least developed ones, to attain a suitable and social level to enable them to ratify and implement ILO Conventions, and these countries therefore expect the ILO to provide them with practical assistance to help them achieve these aims. For this purpose the Governing Body at its 252nd Session in March 1992 carried out an in-depth debate which was highly instructive and positive on the relations between international labour standards and technical cooperation. This debate highlighted the complementarity and interaction of these two essential means of action.

My third general comment concerns the process of reform of the main bodies of the ILO. It is only normal for an organisation which in two years will celebrate its three-quarters of a century of existence to examine the workings of its institutions and to adapt them to the needs of today's world. This is why the Governing Body at its 250th Session set up a Working Party to study the improvements to be made to the functioning of the Conference; this Party met twice, in November 1991 and in February 1992. The work of this Working Party, which is reported in paragraphs 28 to 31 of the report before you, has already led to some concrete decisions, in particular the simplification and acceleration of the procedures at the beginning of the Conference, the shortening of speeches to ten minutes in plenary sittings, and the decision to close the work of the Conference on the Tuesday of the third week. These decisions will be applied at this session of the Conference. The Working Party will continue its work next November. The Governing Body also intends in the very near future to examine its own working methods. These will be studied by either the same, or another Working Party, when the time comes. Quite aside from any proposals for changes which may arise out of this examination, the Governing Body has already decided to shorten, on an experimental basis, the length of its next session in November 1992 by one day at the end of the session. At its 252nd Session in February-March 1992 the Governing Body also adopted a set of procedural reforms for the ILO regional conferences and authorised the Director-General to implement them on an experimental basis at the 13th Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation which is to be held in September 1992 in Caracas. The resolution proposed by the Committee on Standing Orders of the Governing Body concerning the adoption of this revised procedure as a departure from the applicable rules is submitted to you for approval at this session.

Finally, my last general observation concerns the regional aspect of the ILO's activities. Indeed, the life of our institution does not only take place in Geneva but also in the various regions of the world where the ILO must remain attentive to the wishes of its constituents and make every effort to help the populations of these regions to overcome the problems they face of poverty, unemployment and violations of fundamental rights. In this connection the regional conferences of the ILO are valuable for determining the priorities and the most pressing needs of each region. At its 252nd Session the Governing Body was informed of the results of the Eleventh Asian Regional Conference held in Bangkok in December 1991 which adopted important conclusions and resolutions concerning growth and structural adjustment, occupational safety and health, the promotion of freedom of association in Asia and migrant workers in Asia. The next stage in this cycle of meetings will be the 13th Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation, to which I have already referred, in the autumn of this year. Next it will be Africa's turn with the Eighth African Regional Conference in Mauritius at the end of 1993. On the agenda of this conference there will be a technical subject, namely entrepreneurship and small enterprise development in urban and rural sectors, and a question of general policy concerning social security and social protection during periods of structural change.

I would now like to tackle in detail, as it is standard practice, the work done during the first part of the 253rd Session of the Governing Body last week, and in particular the main decisions taken. To start with, the Governing Body gave a preliminary examination to the proposals made by the Director-General concerning the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994. The Governing Body will take a final decision on this matter next November. After an exchange of views the Governing Body decided to request the Director-General to supply it in November 1992 with reports on the laws and regulations and practice in the following seven fields, or more detailed proposals on them. Firstly, the extension of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), to activities in the non-commercial services sector; secondly, a revision of the list of occupational diseases appended to the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121); thirdly, the prevention of accidents in underground mines; fourthly, the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets (general discussion); fifthly, the settlement of labour disputes (general discussion), it being understood that the question of the right to strike will be connected with this item; sixthly, tripartite consultation at the national level on economic and social policy (general discussion); and finally the seventh item, the protection of the fundamental rights of workers with a view to technological development (general discussion).

From the financial point of view, the Governing Body took a number of decisions regarding the use of the 1990-1991 budget surplus at the recommendation of its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. After a long discussion, the Committee adopted a compromise solution under which the Governing Body is proposing that the Conference take a one-time, exceptional measure, allowing a special dispensation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations so that urgent purchases of equipment necessary to the functioning of the Office may be made amounting to 10,324,000 Swiss francs, and permitting a transfer from the budget surplus of 2 million Swiss francs to the housing and building fund. The remainder of the surplus, amounting to some 7 million Swiss francs, will be used to reduce member States' contributions in 1993. A resolution to this effect has been submitted to the Conference for approval.

Moreover, the Conference has before it two proposed resolutions arising out of the work of the Working Party on the Working Capital Fund that the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had set up. The proposals made by this Working Party were discussed at length and at the end of this debate the following compromise was reached by consensus. The amounts to the credit of the member States in Part 1 of the Working Capital Fund as of 31 December 1991 will be released and used to reduce the contributions to the regular budget payable by the member States for the year 1993. Without prejudice to any amendments which will be made to the Financial Regulations, amendments will be submitted to the Conference for its agreement in principle when they are unanimously proposed by the Working Party and when in particular they concern the way in which the benefits earned under the incentive system encouraging the prompt payment of States' contributions are distributed. The Governing Body will, of course, study more carefully the amendments concerning the Financial Regulations in November 1992.

Concerning the use for the programme of the reserve fund which was first established in the Programme and Budget for 1992-93, the Committee studied the Director-General's proposal to create a multi-disciplinary ILO team for Central and Eastern Europe, to carry out employment policy activities for the transitional phase in Central Asia and to organise a tripartite regional workshop on the principle and practice of tripartism and social dialogue in the Arab region. Here too, after a very full discussion, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee agreed to authorise the funding of the above activities under the programme's reserve fund, it being understood that the Director-General will submit to the Governing Body at its forthcoming sessions new proposals for the use of this reserve fund for activities for other regions.

Last week, the Committee also took note of the report on the implementation of the regular programme of the ILO in 1990-91, of the Auditors' report and the report to the Governing Body of the International Training Centre of the ILO, Turin, which augurs well for the future of this Centre.

Finally, at the recommendation of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body is proposing that the Conference adopt at this session resolutions concerning, respectively, the appointment of Governing Body members to the Pensions Fund, amendments to the statutes of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO, and the appointment of judges to this tribunal. At the recommendation of the Allocations Committee, the Governing Body is proposing to the Conference an allocations table for 1993, which in fact can only be done completely once the United Nations General Assembly sets the scale of contributions of the United Nations for some of these States. The new table partially reflects the recent increase of the number of ILO member States, to which I have just referred.

On the basis of the 253rd report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Governing Body approved the final conclusions of the Committee in 11 cases, and its interim conclusions in 12 other cases. The number of cases dealt with by this Committee over the years, which now exceeds 1,600, bears witness to the great importance attached by workers' organisations, and in some cases employers' organisations, to this procedure to guarantee the respect for freedom of association, without which tripartism would be to a great extent a hollow word.

In keeping with its usual practice, during this session the Governing Body's Committee on Discrimination took up number of questions related to apartheid which will be placed before the Committee on Action against Apartheid of your Conference. The Committee, in particular, took note of the information supplied by governments and employers' and workers' organisations on the measures taken against apartheid, the report of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held in Harare from 5 to 8 May 1992, and the report of the Eighth and Ninth Sessions of the Group of Independent Experts to follow up on and monitor the implementation of sanctions and other actions against apartheid. As for the terms of reference of this Group of Independent Experts, the Governing Body decided that its mandate which was to end at the end of June 1992, will be extended by one year and that its renewed mandate will concentrate on the supervision and implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. In this context, the Governing Body will follow closely the evolution of the situation in that country, particularly as far as the establishment of an interim government is concerned. It will also examine all the repercussions this may have on the activities of the Group of Independent Experts and will take note of the financial consequences. Still on the question of apartheid, I would like to point out that the Governing Body had before it the report of the Fact-finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association which had been set up in order to study a complaint concerning the violation of trade union rights against the Government of South Africa. In keeping with the procedure concerning the examination of complaints received agaist States which are not Members of the ILO but are Members of the United Nations, the Governing Body took note of this report without discussion and transmitted it to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Through its Industrial Activities Committee, the Governing Body took a number of decisions concerning on the one hand the follow-up of the conclusions and resolutions adopted by sectoral meetings held during the last quarter of 1991, the Twelfth Session of the Textiles Committee the Second Joint Meeting on Conditions of Work of Teachers and the Second Session of the Food and Drink Industries Committee, and on the other hand concerning the composition of the Fifth Session of the Joint Committee on the Public Service, which will be held next year. The Industrial Activities Committee also started to study the Office's proposals concerning the programme of sectoral meetings for the 1994-95 biennium. At this stage the Committee was also able to make recommendations on the choice of the six major sectoral meetings to be placed on this programme. It has postponed until next November the discussion of questions concerning the agenda of these meetings and the choice of the ad hoc sectoral meetings which will be scheduled for the 1994-95 biennium.

Among the other decisions taken at its last session, the Governing Body approved the reports of a number of technical and other meetings. Among these are the Meeting of Experts on Labour Statistics, Geneva, 28 January-6 February 1992, the Meeting of Experts on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work, Geneva, 24 March-1 April 1992, and the Tripartite Symposium on New Perspectives for Tripartism in Europe, Brussels, 7-8 April 1992. It also had before it a draft agreement between the ILO and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Governing Body approved the text of this agreement and authorised the Director-General to sign it on behalf of the ILO. Finally, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to invite a non-member State, the People's Democratic Republic of Korea, and 44 non-governmental international organisations to be represented at this session of the International Labour Conference.

I am about to close this very long report but I would still like to ask for a few minutes of your time in order to inform you of another of our Governing Body's activities. His Holiness Pope John Paul II granted an audience to the Governing Body of the ILO on Saturday, 30 May. The message of the Pope is directly addressed to our Organisation and I should now like to read it to you:

> It is with the greatest of joy that I welcome the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organisation and also those members of this illustrious Organisation who are accompanying him. This visit brings back the memory of the warm welcome your Organisation extended to me in Geneva in 1982. I should like to take this opportunity to reiterate before you my esteem for the nations and organisations which you represent. I thank you for the two works which you have brought with you today, namely on the social teachings of the Catholic Church and the world of work, and on the commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Rerum Novarum. I am pleased that the Organisation pays special attention to the teachings of the Church, and I perceive similarities between its approach and the social doctrine of the Church. Quite recently the colloquium on work, culture and religion highlighted their common interests and concerns for modern social issues. Today we are witnessing the globalisation of social issues. The difficulties of the countries of the East and the South have repercussions on international markets. The rapid political developments of recent years have generated radical changes in economic structures, and these changes have led to a greater involvement of all social partners, national leaders, management, and workers. The slow and laborious development of many countries which have chosen to follow the rules of market economics and the path of democratisation clearly has reinforced the mission of the International Labour Organisation and the need for it to be vigilant. Indeed, it is sometimes said that you are the social conscience of the world.
> According to the Declaration of Philadelphia, it is the duty of your Organisation to promote tripartite dialogue and cooperation between governments, employers and workers to find solutions which place man at the centre of economic concerns. The International Labour Organisation is also responsible for rallying the international community to combat poverty resulting from unemployment or underemployment, from lack of training and deficiencies in health care. Poverty is one of the major obstacles to social justice.
> The goals which are placed before your Organisation require imagination and coherent and courageous decisions and these will, of course, involve certain sacrifices on the part of the richest nations if there is to be a substantial improvement in the catastrophic situation of entire sectors of the world population. Collaboration with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank is also necessary to check the scourge of poverty, a scourge whose abatment will be a sign that social progress is being achieved. To this end, it would be desirable to have greater transparency in political and economic decisions. Considerations, which are solely financial and budgetary, cannot justify a dismissive attitude to the social dimension. The inalienable dignity of man and the protection of workers, which are the supreme values in any society, cannot be flouted with impunity. Your concerns in this area are akin to those of the Church. Man must be placed at centre stage in economic, political and social restructuring resulting from the liberalisation of markets and the advent of democracy, as the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Michel Hansenne, reminds us in his Report to the Conference which will be held shortly.
> Social development flows from tripartite dialogue and it is your mandate to promote and further this dialogue throughout the world, but it is not enough to bring together politicians and economists, employers and workers. Dialogue should lead the protagonists to greater partnership, greater participation in development and towards the creation of a more equitable society and the negotiations should serve not merly the interests of certain sectors but the cause of mankind as a whole. Governments should promote economic development and regulate social dialogue, whereas the managers and the workers' representatives must achieve a structured approach so that they can negotiate and really act for the good of all.
> I hope that the constituents and staff of the International Labour Office will continue their unstinting efforts to put a human face upon the world of work and to establish social justice. I should also like to stress the considerable work which has been done by our Organisation to help the most disadvantaged sectors of the world today, that is, migrant workers, refugees and children at work. These people, who are vulnerable and often defenceless, need assistance and support and it is your duty to remind the international community that it must continue to make greater efforts so that everyone will participate in and benefit from development.
> In conclusion, may I convey my best wishes to the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference which is shortly to be held in Geneva. I pray to God to make the members of the International Labour Organisation servants of Man in the image of the Creator, called upon to assist in creation, and I bless you with all my heart, you and your families.
> John Paul II, 30 May 1992.

And before I leave the podium after this very lengthy report, I should like to thank Mr. Oechslin and Mrs. Carr, the Vice-Chairmen of the Governing Body, for all their support and friendly assistance during this year. We formed a team to serve you. Finally, I should address myself also to Michel Hansenne and convey to him my very warmest gratitude as also to all the staff of the International Labour Office.

Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion

Original – French: The PRESIDENT – Before opening the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, I would like to make the following statement on behalf of the officers of the Conference. This statement concerns the way in which we intend to discharge our duties and I am making it on behalf of all the officers of the Conference in order to remind you of the principles that we intend to apply in the course of this discussion. These principles will be applied as uniformly as possible to all interventions, regardless of the speaker. The principles that will guide us were defined by the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the ILO, and approved by the Governing Body and submitted to the Conference in 1967. They are set out in paragraphs 54 to 58 of its report, and reproduced in the Memorandum on the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, a copy of which you should all have received by now. It is incumbent upon the officers of the Conference to draw the attention of all delegates to paragraph 58, which reads as follows: "In periods of acute political tension the ILO has a twofold responsibility – to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity enshrined in its Constitution, and to circumscribe rather than extend the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of continued cooperation in pursuit of the objectives of the ILO. Every delegate to the International Labour Conference therefore has an obligation to the Conference to keep these considerations constantly in mind, and the President has an obligation to ensure that the Conference does not lose sight of them."

In accordance with this obligation, I would like to draw the attention of the Conference to these principles. In full agreement with my fellow officers and on behalf of all of you, I would like to urge delegates to collaborate with us in applying these principles. We hope, in particular, that every delegate will recognise that the officers of the Conference are responsible for ensuring that these principles are observed. My colleagues and I are determined to carry out this responsibility. Freedom of expression is the lifeblood of the International Labour Organisation. However, in order to exercise this right in a spirit of mutual respect, we all have to accept a certain degree of discipline if we want our work to run smoothly and be successful. It is the duty of the President of the sitting to ensure that these principles are respected, and the officers of the Conference will not hesitate to intervene in this respect. In particular, if a speaker slanders a Head of State or Government, or personally insults another delegate, the President will intervene immediately.

At the Conference, all delegates should use parliamentary language and respect the accepted procedure, refer only to the points under discussion and avoid raising any question alien to these matters. Any delegate who wishes to reply to a statement should refrain from asking for the floor by raising a point of order. A delegate should instead inform the President of the sitting before that sitting ends of his or her wish to exercise the right of reply. A request for a right of reply should be presented to the officers in the course of the sitting in which a delegate considers that the right of reply should be exercised. The request should be transmitted to the President through the Clerk of the Conference, and not by asking for the floor during the sitting.

I would like to make clear the practice for the exercise of the right of reply. The reply should refer only to the point in question. It should be brief, not to exceed two or three minutes, and should under no circumstances give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be worded in proper parliamentary language.

I would also like to point out that, in order to avoid endless discussions, it has been a practice of Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

I would also like to draw your attention to the recommendation presented this morning by the Selection Committee concerning the reduction of the speaking time for delegates participating in the discussion of the Report of the Director-General. This recommendation, which is aimed at ensuring that speaking time should not exceed ten minutes, was again formally submitted to the Conference this year and approved after consultation with the Vice-Presidents, pending the entry into force of the amendment of Article 14 of the Standing Orders, which is to be adopted at this session. I therefore urge all delegates to focus their remarks on the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

The time available to the Conference to examine its agenda is limited. It is therefore vital to comply with these provisions fully. All Ministers and delegates attending the Conference will, I am sure, when preparing their interventions, wish to take into account this limit of ten minutes so that the President will not be forced to interrupt them before they have finished their speech.

Allow me to remind you that, in accordance with our practice, the running of the discussion falls within the sole purview of the officers and the President. In particular, it is up to the President to ensure that the principles and provisions of the Standing Orders to which I have just referred are respected.

Concerning the special sitting on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, may I remind you that, on the proposal of the Selection Committee, the Conference has decided to allow the speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the general report and during the special sitting, it being understood that the subject to be discussed in the special sitting would not be discussed in the debate on the rest of the report. In this respect, allow me to point out that a decision has been taken that the closing date for the list of speakers for the special sitting has been set for Friday, 12 June, at 6 o'clock.

It goes without saying that all the principles which I have mentioned also apply to the special sitting, apart from the time-limit for speeches which, depending on the number of speakers, may be less than ten minutes.

With your cooperation and your help, we will fully discharge all the responsibilities conferred on us with a view to ensuring the proper conduct and success of this 79th Session of the Conference. We would like to thank you in advance for your understanding.

(The President continues in Portuguese):

The next item on our agenda this afternoon is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. MASINDE (Minister for Labour, Kenya) – On behalf of the Kenya delegation, please allow me to of your congratulate you, together with the members Office on your well-deserved election to guide the deliberations of this session of the ILO annual Conference.

My delegation has noted that the Report of the Director-General for this year's session of the Conference consists of two parts: Part I on democratisation and the ILO, and Part II covering activities of the ILO during 1991.

Regarding Part I, which is the central theme for this year's session of the Conference, my delegation's view is that the Report has given a very comprehensive account of the topic particularly in the light of the changes currently being experienced by the various countries in their determination to establish genuine democracy which will guarantee fundamental individual and collective rights. Indeed, my delegation agrees with the Director-General when he says that "far-reaching reforms taking place in the world have their inspiration in the values and principles which imbued the establishment of the ILO and which have never ceased to guide it in its work". In this respect, it is only proper that the ILO should undertake to help its Members in pursuing this democratisation process if the Organisation were to remain faithful to its fundamental mission.

The ILO is better equipped to play a more positive role in the current democratisation process through the gradual promotion of ratification and practical application of its various international labour standards, especially with regard to those standards that are related to basic human rights.

Kenya, as a Member of the ILO family, concurs with the view that we all must strive together for greater democracy and greater social justice in our respective countries. Kenya further agrees with the Director-General when he says (and I quote) that "democracy, the symbol of the inspirations of humanity and repository of its hope for a better life, is a dynamic concept which has grown and evolved unceasingly with the passage of time".

Democracy is not a static concept and every step forward or achievement, is just one more stage in its evolution. In other words, the term "democratisation" should generally be seen as a process whereby the people themselve in any country, assume responsibility for their destiny. It should also be understood that the real aim of any genuine democracy should be the defence and promotion of the basic freedom of the individual, including freedom of opinion, association, press and so on. I also agree that such democracy can be reinforced by the rule of the law, the existence of an independent judiciary, the regular holding of free and fair elections under universal adult suffrage, multi-party democracy and so on.

As far as Kenya is concerned, in recent times it has undergone very major political changes and reforms after Parliament repealed Section 2 (a) of our Constitution, hence paving the way for the introduction of multi-party democracy from a single party State. The Government has already effected the necessary political reforms, paving the way for free and fair multi-party general elections, supervised and directed by an independent electoral commission.

The Government has also given a firm assurance that the first multi-party elections will be preceded by the registration of voters, which begins this month. Those who qualify will not be hindered from registration. In order to further enhance accountability and transparency, the National Assembly has passed an Anti-corruption (Amendment) Act which increased penalties for corruption offences.

It should, however, be noted that the Government of Kenya has always ensured that all fundamental freedoms of the individual were upheld. The independence of the Judiciary has also been fully respected by the Government.

My delegation also agrees that there exists a close link between democratisation, economic development and economic growth. We believe that for real democracy to survive, it is necessary that the same should go hand in hand with rapid economic growth in order to meet the basic necessities of the people such as food, clothing, shelter, medical attention and so on. It must be realised that for the people living in poverty in any country, development is bound to be a matter of life and death, struggle and no form of democracy can survive under such circumstances.

In the case of Africa in general, the democratisation process currently taking place will mean more democracy, respect for the rule of law and fundamental human rights, good government, accountability and transparency. This in turn will help to create the necessary political climate for both domestic and foreign investment.

The Kenya delegation has taken a careful note of the new ILO policy of linking technical assistance with the democratisation process in the affected countries. It should be realised, however, that the new democracies coming up will need considerable assistance and support, if they are to survive, for without such support, they would lose the popular support that was so necessary for their success. This is especially so when it is recalled that millions of people in many parts of the world and in the developing countries in particular live in poverty caused by unemployment and lack of basic amenities. This serious affront to human dignity was a major cause of social injustice and chaos. It should be recalled that most of the ILO member States were developing countries whose most urgent priority was to ensure the survival and improvement of the lives of their people, which in many cases, meant the satisfaction of the most basic needs. It is the view of my delegation, therefore, that unless the basic needs were met and poverty throughout the world eradicated, the ILO's pursuit of its basic aims and objectives will be greatly compromised.

My delegation has noted with appreciation the three technical items scheduled for discussion during this session of the Conference, namely, the item on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, the item on the need for the prevention of industrial disasters, and finally adjustment and human resources development. My delegation looks forward to benefiting from the final conclusions and recommendations emanating from these discussions.

On the issue of child labour, my delegation notes that the protection of children from work and at work has been one of the basic principles of this noble organisation, the ILO. We have further noted that from its very beginning, the ILO called in the Preamble to its constitution for the protection of children and young persons. It is in this respect that I would like to take this opportunity to express the Kenya Government's deep gratitude and appreciation to the ILO and the Government of Germany for the excellent work that the two are doing in Kenya in the field of child labour, under the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour.

Allow me now to make a few remarks regarding the ILO's role in the field of training. We recognise the fact that training plays a vital role in our development process and it is in this respect that we would like to ask the ILO to allocate more resources for training activities. In this context, we fully support the International Training Centre, Turin, the International Institute for Labour Studies, the African Regional Labour Administration Centre, namely ARLAC, as well as other training activities in which the ILO plays a significant role.

My delegation warmly welcomes the joining of the ILO family by the republics of Estonia, Korea, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania. Their decision to join the ILO has made this organisation more universal and this will also contribute significantly towards its noble ideals and objectives.

In view of the important role played by the ILO in the world affairs in general and advancement of social and economic justice in particular, the Kenya Government will always be prepared to give its moral and material support within her limited resources. A great deal has been achieved by the ILO. A great deal more remains to be achieved. I, therefore, would like to take this opportunity to call upon all the member States to support this worthy organisation wholeheartedly in its noble task of improving the quality of life for the benefit of the whole of mankind.

Original – English: Mrs. ALI-KHAN (Government delegate, Guyana) – First of all permit me to convey, on behalf of myself and the members of my delegation, warm and sincere congratulations to the President on his election to the Chair of this 79th Session. We are confident that his distinguished career and experience will enable him to guide and manage this session so that our desired goals can be achieved.

It is a distinct honour for me to make some remarks on behalf of my country, Guyana, at this Session of the International Labour Conference. Let me restate at the outset that my country is fully committed to the principles and ideals of the International Labour Organisation and supports its efforts to promote peace and social justice in a world beset by many socio-economic and political problems and challenges.

Guyana is proud to be a Member of this body and takes seriously its obligations to create a healthy climate for the effective conduct of industrial relations.

My Ministry's responsibility, therefore, in the field of labour administration and labour relations, is to encourage and assist employers and trade unions to develop and apply sound labour policies which aim at a greater measure of equity and social justice. This approach is important for the orderly conduct of labour relations. It also corresponds to our national policy which is committed to social justice, the improved quality of life, the development of human resources, the opening up of channels of communication between the social partners and the recognition of the link between economic growth and social progress.

Our national labour programme accordingly seeks to contribute to the social and economic development of the people of Guyana through the development and implementation of sound labour policies, the adoption and application of relevant international labour standards and the encouragement of tripartite commitment to fair labour practices.

The conditions of work and quality of life of workers throughout the world have been the concern of us, the Members of the ILO, as reflected in the numerous instruments affecting working people globally. My country shares this concern and recognises the invaluable contribution of the ILO in influencing improvements in the conditions of work and life of employees everywhere. This can clearly be seen from the Report of the Director-General on the activities of the ILO in 1991. My country recognises the need to promote a better understanding of international minimum standards in employment conditions for the labour force worldwide.

The importance of the International Labour Conference is appreciated, for it provides a special opportunity for participants, representatives of governments, employers and trade unions to exchange views, share experiences, review developments and trends and consider international instruments. It is hoped that the deliberations of the Conference will enable participants to influence labour policies and practices more in accord with the international standards of the ILO, and that social consensus can be forged at the national level among governments, employers and trade unions working together to create an industrial climate conducive to better conditions of work, safety standards and the training and development of human resources.

It is hoped that this session of the Conference will inspire participants to influence the adoption of international standards, or substantially equivalent conditions.

International labour standards are important guidelines for the social partners. It requires determination and willingness on all sides to use these standards for the development of efficient industries which can provide adequately for their employees and their families for, indeed, international standards seek to improve labour conditions, establish social justice, regulate the international mobility of labour, deal with the technological complexity of modern industry and influence industrial social and labour legislation.

We wish to place on record my country's and my delegation's appreciation of and continued support for the solid work of the ILO around the world, through the Director-General and his dedicated staff, both at Geneva and its regional offices. Indeed, the activities of the ILO in 1991, as set forth in the Director-General's Report, reveal a wide range of actions of critical importance to the improvement of social and labour conditions of the global workforce. In my own country, and the Caribbean subregion, while we restructure our economies and strengthen the democratic process, we are grappling with some of these issues to give expression to the standards and principles we have adopted at the ILO, and we are trying to create conditions that will improve the working life of the people of the Caribbean region.

In my country we have made several adjustments to our economic strategies, giving a greater role to market forces by deregulating areas affecting trade and investment. In order to achieve the best results we have made adjustments to our tax and fiscal schemes, granting tax relief to workers and incentives to employers. Consequently, wages, salaries and other conditions of service have been improved within the limits of our monetary resources and in consultation with the trade unions and other representative bodies.

We note with satisfaction the continued presence of the ILO Caribbean Office in Trinidad and Tobago, and its invaluable service to the region. In partiicular, we are pleased with the recent appointment of an officer to strengthen relations with employers of the region. We have been working and collaborating with the Caribbean Office at the regional level, through the Caribbean Community CARICOM, and through the individual member States in many meaningful ways in the areas of labour administration.

labour law, labour market information, manpower planning, social security, cooperative development, small-enterprise development and manpower training and development. While we understand that the intensity of work in our region depends on the allocation of resources, both human and financial, we are constrained to call for a strengthening of the ILO Caribbean Office – more manpower expertise and financial resources – so that there can be greater intensity of work in the Caribbean region. We want a stronger Caribbean Office, and indeed we look forward to the Caribbean region being represented in the Governing Body of the ILO for the next period.

At this session of the Conference, we will be considering and reviewing the work of the ILO through the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. We also have important agenda items, including adjustment and human resources development.

The phenomenon of structural adjustment is a severe test for the social partners, especially the way it affects people's economic and social conditions. In terms of the development of a more open economy, one that is more market-oriented, designed to promote economic development and growth, we face the challenge of finding a fair and steady balance between the need to stimulate and build a productive economic system, and the need to preserve the basic elements of social justice. The impact of structural adjustment on employment and remuneration is severe in the short term, and we have to find ways to avoid deep and widespread social dislocations. We have to find workable options, and explore practical solutions to advance the welfare of world labour. The ILO is a critical partner in this regard, given its position and expertise.

I express the hope that the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will contribute to the continued growth and development of industries around the world, and of the workers of the world and their families, and I express the hope that participants will have an enriching, stimulating and knowledge-sharing experience. I wish continued success to the Director-General and his staff, as together we seek to fulfil the imperatives of the mandate to improve the quality of life of the working people of the world.

Original – English: Mr. CHUNG (Government representative, Republic of Korea): It is a great honour for me to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Government and people of the Republic of Korea.

First of all, I would like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to you, Mr. President, upon your unanimous election to the Presidency of this session. Under your distinguished leadership, I am certain that this Conference will be fruitful and productive.

Upon examining the Report of the Director-General, I am impressed with the remarkable performances and achievements of the ILO over the past year. To Mr. Hansenne and his colleagues, I express my respect and appreciation for all the outstanding work they have done for the success of the session.

In his Report, entitled "Democratisation and the ILO", he emphasises the need for the ILO's active role in helping many countries' development of democratisation. I think it is timely and desirable that this session focuses its attention on this subject.

I believe that freedom, social justice and world peace, which are the long-cherished desires of mankind and the basic spirit of the ILO, can only be achieved through democracy. However, as history teaches us, the development of democratic societies is a process inevitably accompanied by transitional pains.

In today's world, the transition from authoritarianism to democracy in many countries is fraught with challenges such as inflation, high unemployment rates and conflicts among different interest groups. Therefore, I place great value on the ILO's efforts and expect the ILO to play a more constructive role in supporting those countries' endeavours to establish a democratic society.

Turning to my own country, since the June 29th Declaration of 1987, the Republic of Korea has achieved rapid democratisation socially, economically and politically. In the course of this change, our society has suffered from many problems including the significant increase in labour disputes. However, social order has been restored and the democratic norm has been settled since last year.

Owing to this positive development, the Government of the Republic of Korea is implementing various policies to improve economic justice and to re-establish economic vitality. Ultimately, we are trying to achieve a welfare society in which people can equally enjoy and benefit from fruits of industrial prosperity.

I would now like to offer a few comments on the topics before this session. Firstly, as we are discussing for the second time, "Protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer" is a very important topic in view of the fact that it specifies concretely the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) which contains provisions for protecting workers from financial difficulties in the event of the insolvency of their employer.

Furthermore, I feel that the proposal which emerged from last year's preliminary discussions on the topic is very realistic and comprehensive. The proposed policy platform on the protection of workers' claims includes both means of privilege and a guarantee institution, and calls for the adoption of those proposals based on a flexible system that takes into account the particular socio-economic factors of the individual country.

Since 1974, the Labour Standards Act of the Republic of Korea has stipulated that reimbursement of workers' wages, retirement grants, accident compensation, and other obligatory rights relating to labour contracts, should have priority over taxes, public imposts, and other claims, except for the right of pledge and obligatory right granted by way of security. Moreover, the Act protects the privilege of workers' claims by guaranteeing that the reimbusement of wages for three months prior to the insolvency has priority, even over the right of pledge and obligatory right granted by way of security.

The worker's right of claims generated from a labour contract, such as on wages and retirement grants, should be sufficiently protected since it has a direct effect on the worker's life. On the other hand, in legislating these privileges, it is important to make harmony with safety of general contracts and protection of a third party's property right.

As we all know, economic, legal and social conditions vary from country to country. Therefore, it would be most appropriate of a new Convention and Recommendation dealing with this subject would allow for maximum flexibility of the individual nations in enacting the scope and object of claim right that should be protected.

The next topic on which I wish to comment is the prevention of industrial disasters. In my view, it is timely and appropriate for the Conference to take up this subject in view of the fact that people throughout the world are taking a growing interest in environmental problems. It is true that an increase in the production and use of hazardous materials would aggravate dangers from major accidents such as fire, explosion and gas leakage, and cause extensive environmental damage. Therefore, it would be an epoch-making event in the prevention of industrial disasters if we adopt a proposed Convention dealing with the prevention of major industrial accidents.

In the case of the Republic of Korea, that has achieved remarkable economic success over the past 30 years, prevention of industrial disasters and protection of the environment have become prominent issues in these days. The Industrial Safety and Health Act in the Republic of Korea, in connection with other legislation, devises a proper measure of various major hazard control to prevent accidents from the use of hazardous materials. Furthermore, we are improving the health and safety of workers by taking the necessary policy measures in preventing occupational diseases caused by hazardous and noxious materials.

I would like to take this opportunity to stress the importance of strengthening technological cooperation between developed and developing countries, and continuing investment in the prevention of industrial disasters as well as environmental protection, based upon each country's socio-economic conditions.

The Republic of Korea became a Member of the ILO on 9 December following admission to the United Nations on 17 September 1991.

I would like to express my heartfelt gratitude to the Members of the ILO who have actively supported my country's efforts to gain admission to this important and prestigious world organisation. We will do our best to fulfil our mission and duties as a member country and, closely to cooperate with other member countries by carrying out the noble objectives of the ILO substantially, and by participating in the ILO's activities positively.

I sincerely hope that this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will lead to results and ideas that will significantly contribute to the safety and the prosperity of all mankind and the development of democracy.

Original – French: Mr. JUNCKER (Minister of Labour; Minister of Finance, Luxembourg) – Mr. President, first of all allow me to extend my congratulations and those of the Government of Luxembourg on your election to the presidency of this session. My congratulations also go to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Organisation, and his staff.

The subject chosen by the Director-General fits in neatly with the ultimate goal of maintaining peace. We have reached a turning point in European history. Paradoxically, this is characterised by apparently contradictory movements in Europe. In contrast to the fragmentation of the state entities in the East, we can see a more marked legal and tangible alignment of the Member States of the European Community. Despite what happened yesterday in one of the Member States of the Community, this alignment is reflected in the Maastricht agreement consolidating the wish of the peoples of the European Community to unity more closely in the framework of European union. I am convinced that in time the countries of Central and Eastern Europe will achieve such a level of stability and democracy that it will be possible for all European countries to come together and build a European home which is economically, politically and socially sound and which will enable us all to live in peace and freedom.

Nevertheless, today the international community is, without doubt, duty-bound to do everything it can to help countries faced with structural change so that the tireless efforts needed to bring about the radical change they are undergoing bear fruit.

I can fully support what the Director-General says, that the solution to alarming problems such as unemployment, inflation, insecurity, lack of democracy, etc., can only be the result of an active partnership between international organisations and emerging democracies and, I would add, all other States. This active partnership should operate in all areas.

I would like to point out that this partnership will work both ways whereas the problems to be solved are undoubtedly problems facing us all. Isolated reasoning would not take into account the reality. Cooperation on an equal footing between all parties involved is necessary. If the problems in the East are not solved they will very shortly become the problems of the West. It would be disastrous to deny this reality.

I feel that the details of the specific form of assistance or intervention on the part of the ILO in such-and-such a State must be decided jointly between the applicant State and the international organisation. I think I am not well placed to hand out advice and interfere in these bilateral relations. I am therefore not in a position to provide the suggestions requested by the Director-General, they can only come from the member States directly concerned which are familiar with their needs and can, if necessary, already start drawing conclusions from the preliminary experience of assistant projects set up by the ILO or individual States.

As far as major principles and basic options are concerned, I share the analysis of Mr. Hansenne, who seems to have given an accurate list of the means of intervention in the process of democratisation at the disposal of his Organisation.

The ILO should act as a catalyst and coordinator with regard to projects, programmes and initiatives. Since the Organisation is not able to do everything by itself, matching supply with demand and coordinating bilateral activities should be priority tasks, outside, of course, the projects which it will continue to manage alone.

I am thinking of all those member States in positions of strength which should face up to their responsibilities and make available to the fledging democracies their knowledge and experience, and give these countries unconditional support in areas where they may be of help. This bilateral action under the auspices and guidance of the ILO have distinct advantages. It would be very efficient because the two parties would be able to see what the needs were and what assistance was possible. This would leave the International Labour Organisation free to devote itself to those tasks which would more properly be within its competence, such as technical cooperation and supporting the ratification of standards, etc. I think it would be useful within the ILO to regularly review bi- or nultilateral operations and organise meetings, at least on an annual basis, between ministers of labour, particularly those from European countries.

The ILO should not neglect the North-South aspect of its work, which should remain a high priority, in spite of the remarkable developments in the East.

The three priorities in the ILO, in the countries facing structural change, support to democratisation, the struggle against poverty and the improvement of workers' protection.

But there is a further aspect which I feel deserves the same priority status, namely vocational training and, in particular, training the trainers. A rapid adjustment of qualifications should enable the States themselves to acquire the human resources which will put them on the right track and this would promote those democratic values which underpin effective social dialogue. In this respect ILO assistance is essential.

We must concentrate at the same time on all of these goals which are very closely linked and indeed interdependent. The process of democratisation, and the establishment of democratic industrial relations are the prerequisite for the implementation of the means to combat poverty and exclusion. Democratic industrial relations are necessary to establish rules which will effectively protect workers. I am very happy to see that finally it is being acknowledged that social objectives are crucial and must be taken into account if countries are to achieve economic restructuring which leads to genuine and sustainable economic development.

This change in mentality has come at a time when the Member States of the EEC have at last officially recognised that social policy must go hand in hand with political and economic change. The European Council considered social policy as one of its main topics at the conference in Maastricht. The Government of Luxembourg has always affirmed that Europe could not be built upon economic foundations alone, but that it would also need to be supported by social policy. Our citizens will only accept Europe as a concept if economic development is accompanied by tangible social progress.

The same phenomenon, I am sure, has been recognised by our friends in Central and Eastern Europe, the difficult period of economic redeployment and political reconstruction will only be successful if social protection is assured on the basis of democratic industrial relations.

In my dual capacity as Minister of Finance and Minister of Labour, I have had the opportunity in various forums to protest against projects which promote economic development to the detriment of social policy.

This is why I unreservedly support all initiatives to involve the ILO in work done by certain international economic organisations.

Democratisation of industrial relations is without doubt a crucial area. The Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO is all the more convincing because the ILO has always pioneered the practice of participation and pluralism. The ILO has always defended the democratic values enshrined in its Constitution, particularly through its tripartite structure.

The vast arsenal of standards developed throughout the years by the ILO is the basis for setting up democratic social structures. The major concern of the Organisation will therefore be to assist those countries which are undergoing restructuring so that they ratify as speedily as possible at least the basic Conventions.

It is not enough to have fine theories and principles enshrined in the texts; there must also be application in practice.

The basis of any socio- and industrial democracy is real social dialogue – the participation of all the partners, according to different systems and at different levels in the elaboration of social measures to accompany economic development.

Social dialogue through the Maastricht agreements has been anchored in the very institutions of the European Union. Thus, the social partners will now be able to play a determining role in social policy in the Communities.

Although many questions still remain unanswered as to principle and method, with regard to the legal machinery provided for in the Maastricht agreements, we nevertheless welcome the fact that social dialogue has been thus enshrined in the treaty. True social justice will result from the participation of workers and employers in free discussions amongst themselves and with governments and in decisions democratically taken. Tripartite instruments are of great value not only in times of crisis, but after, too.

However, in times or relative economic well-being, there is an inherent danger in the functioning of tripartism.

Mr. Hansenne quite rightly spoke of all partners having their own specific role to play, whilst still working for the common good. For tripartism to function well, all those involved must recognise their responsibilities. Obviously, everyone must defend the interests of the party they represent, but also never lose sight of the fact that they are acting in the general interest. This a basic prerequisite.

I hope you will understand that my warning is meant as an appeal. Let us safeguard genuine social dialogue so that our social and economic policy decisions continue to be democratically legitimate and in the interests of all.

Original – German: Mr. ARBESSER-RASTBURG (Employers' delegate, Austria) – First of all, I would like to extend my wholehearted congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues upon and to the his election as President of this 79th Session of the International Conference and to the Vice-Presidents upon their election. I am convinced that they will succeed in steering the difficult problems which we will be discussing in the next few weeks towards an acceptable solution.

It gives me great pleasure to welcome the tripartite delegations of those countries which have become members of our Organisation since the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like to extend my special welcome to the Baltic States – Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania – which have managed to regain their independence after 50 years. As an Austrian, it is particularly important for me to support all measures in favour of the former Communist States of Eastern and Central Europe. The ILO in particular can make a major contribution towards the reorganisation of these States by giving them assistance for self-help. The development of independent employers' and workers' organisations plays a major role in this respect.

I think it is very important that the Director-General has devoted the first part of his Report to the subject of democratisation and the ILO. Of course, I devoted my attention particularly to the chapter on employers' organisations. The path from a centrally planned economy to a market economy is made more difficult because of a lack of managerial and senior staff in the States undergoing reform. The Director-General rightly points out that in its 1992-93 programme and budget the ILO has devoted substantial resources to the development of the entrepreneurial spirit, not least the smaller units. It goes without saying that in providing aid for Central and Eastern Europe, support for the developing countries in Asia, Africa and South America should not be overlooked.

In the second part of the Report of the Director-General, I saw with great satisfaction the successful conclusion of 30 years of activity for the interregional project for the production of Material and Techniques for Cooperative Management Training (MATCOM). This working party of the ILO, which completed its task in an exemplary manner in Vienna, was responsible for the training of almost 200,000 individuals in some 60 countries. The results of this project are described as being of high quality and great importance.

As a permanent representative of the International Organisation of Employers at UNIDO and the Office of the United Nations in Vienna, I particularly welcome the new arrangements reached between our Organisation and UNIDO. I am convinced that this will make possible closer cooperation between these two specialised agencies of the United Nations to the benefit of developing countries.

For almost 35 years I have attended various sessions of Industrial Committees, the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body; and I note that there is a basic difference between the world of today – that is to say the world of the nineties – and that of the last decades.

Let us all take advantage of these auspicious times and do our utmost to ensure that there may be a breakthrough in the attainment of the aims of our Organisation.

In this way, we may help to secure social peace worldwide and pave the way for peace throughout the world.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ESTIGARRIBIA (Minister of Justice and Labour, Paraguay) – I would like to start by congratulating the President on his election; I am confident that his experience and capabilities will lead these deliberations to a successful conclusion.

The Paraguayan delegation has duly noted the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General, and we fully share the views put forward in these documents. We agree that the world is now going through substantive changes which affect also the workplace, and we value fully the efforts made by the International Labour Organisation to bring about an improvement in social justice among its member States.

It is with deep satisfaction and legitimate pride of international recognition that the Paraguayan delegation, which is composed of representatives of the national Government, of employers and of workers, is attending the Conference for the second consecutive year after returning to the International Labour Organisation.

As promised by the democratic Government of the Republic of Paraguay to national and international public opinion, we have been complying meticulously with an ambitious programme aimed at transforming obsolete legal and authoritarian structures. The quick pace of change has not discouraged our citizens from casting their ballots time and time again to elect their representatives for national, municipal, legislative and conventional office. The freely elected representatives of the people are in the process of implementing constitutional and legal provisions to improve the necessary balance between individual and social interests.

In this historic process, characterised by difficulties which most developing nations share, the national Government through its institutions is seeking to reconcile all social interests on the basis of equity and social justice.

In this connection we can state with confidence that the Paraguayan people have an unquenchable thirst for progress and well-being. We are learning to understand that an individual, even if different or antagonistic, is not dangerous, but creative and imaginative. The development of the human person, based upon the exercise of individual rights, is the guarantee of social growths and presupposes the full use of society's potential.

One year ago in this same hall we referred to the imminent convocation of a National Constitutional Convention in our country. Today, the 198 citizens who have been elected to this Constitutional Assembly (politicians, jurists, trade unionists, employers and highly representative sectors of Paraguayan society) are in the process of drawing up a new Constitution for our country, and will very soon present the framework of a document which seeks to fulfil the nation's aspirations.

In this context, the social partners have the mission of participating fully in the task of building a new society, based on a new constitutional and legal framework, since worker-employer relations constitute the epicentre of this process, and since the social, culture, economic and political growth we want to bring about is based upon a discipline which comes from individual and collective responsibility for a healthy society.

This work of social reconstruction is now being undertaken by the national Government, with the benefit of the solidarity of international organisations such as the International Labour Organisation, whose invaluable help is of vital importance for the achievement of our objectives.

The new possibilities offered by a competitive market, following the Treaty of Asunción and the creation of the MERCOSUR common market, require that our country enhance its vocational training and prepare its workforce for better jobs. Consequently, the Government is promoting training through suitable policies and the expansion of our national training services.

The process of integration which began on 26 March 1991 with the Treaty of Asunción, signed by Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Paraguay, has led to meetings between government officials from various fields that will be affected by the application of this Treaty. The Ministers of Labour of the four countries have met several times to discuss and to coordinate efforts in the social and labour aspects of integration until the year 1994, when this Treaty will fully come into force.

These meetings led to the creation of a working group for "Labour Relations, Employment and Social Security" under Annex 5 of the Treaty which concerns social policies. The special contribution of the ILO in this field is handled through its area office for Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay; this office is participating fully in the labour aspects of integration in the four countries that make up MERCOSUR.

Freedom of association is guaranteed and respected by the national Government. Last year we informed this Conference that since the new Government came to office, the number of unionised workers had doubled and that registered trade unions had increased by 65 per cent as compared with the cumulative number of trade unions in the 35 years of the previous Government. Today we wish to report that in 1991 106 new trade unions were registered, for an increase of 17.17 per cent over 1990. On 31 December 1991 there were 901 trade unions.

The right to strike is fully respected by the national Government. Thirty strikes were called in 1991 and conciliation agreements were reached in 60 per cent of these cases. Between January and March 1992 there were 12 strikes with conciliation agreements being reached in 10 per cent of these cases.

Today the labour provisions in force are applied by the administrative labour authority in the most favourable way for the trade union organisations. In this respect, the executive power was aware that the present labour laws were not consonant with the requirements of employers and workers and it issued legislative decree No. 43 on 31 March 1992 which amends and extends paragraphs and incorporates new sections into Chapter 1, which concerns sanctions, of Book V of Act No. 727/61, the Labour Code, with a view to protecting the rights of workers and ensuring respect of labour provisions and lays down a new Labour Code which is now being studied by the National Parliament.

The national Government is giving priority to measures to improve the conditions of work and working environment. To this end it has set up a National Council for Occupational Safety and Health under the Ministry of Justice and Labour. The council is a tripartite body of a technical, scientific, social nature, the main objective of which is to define in a democratic and participatory manner policies and action in the field of occupational safety and health. In order to make these proposals financially and technically feasible and in keeping with the policy of giwing priority to the improvement of working conditions and the working environment, a Directorate of Occupational Safety and Health has been set up under the Ministry of Justice and Labour, which acts as the executive body of the Council, and which has a budget which is five times higher than that of the previous financial year. All this is proof of what we are doing to improve labour conditions.

In this forum which is open to the concerns of labour throughout the world we send our greetings from Paraguay to all the nations represented at this session of the Conference.

Original – French: Mrs. SASSO MAZZUFFERI (Employers' delegate, Italy) – I address to the President my warmest congratulations on his election. This is a very positive element which augurs well for our Conference. I should like to congratulate the Director-General and all his staff on all the work which they accomplished over the last year.

I will mention but a few of their activities which are of particular interest to us. The first positive note I should like to strike is the work done by the Turin Centre. Their activities, the number of participants and the level of skills are constantly improving. The directorate of the Centre, and in particular, Mr. Tremeaud, deserve not only our commendation but above all our increased support for the continuation of the long-term programme with a view to a better use of the capacities of the Centre to meet the new and growing training needs of many countries throughout the world, including those of Central and Eastern Europe, where the situation requires a considerable commitment on an urgent basis.

Secondly, activities to assist employers are of particular and growing importance to us, in particular as regards technical assistance programmes to establish or reinforce free and independent employers' organisations. High priority should also be given to programmes for the integration of women in economic and social life; finally efforts made to assist countries in transition should be particularly commended. In his Report, the Director-General reaffirms the ILO's interest in these spheres.

The Bureau for Employers' Activities, which deals with this enormous programme, should become the ideal link between the world of enterprises and the ILO services, so that requirements and suggestions from business circles could be taken into account in the preparation of ILO programmes.

Let me now look towards the future. Discussions in the March session of the Governing Body on the ILO's priorities enabled the Employers' group to formulate specific proposals on topics to be selected, including productive employment which generates wealth, which for us is the top priority. In order to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of our work, there was a proposal that the ILO structure should be made more flexible and that the role of the Governing Body should be reinforced as regards general policy decisions.

The Italian employers support efforts which have been made to draw our Organisation closer to the new needs of its Members and more able to meet these needs.

The part of the Report which deals with democratisation contains an in-depth analysis of a subject which is crucial to our era. Although it is true that democratisation is a slow and complex process, we must all work together to stimulate and accelerate it, which is in the interest not only of the peoples directly involved but of Europe as a whole and the entire social and economic system of the world. Indeed, the reinforcement of human and trade union rights, autonomous collective bargaining, free initiative with due respect for market rules, the application of international labour standards in countries experiencing transition, are of crucial importance which transcends the States in which this process is taking place.

In this context tripartism is the method which promotes independent economic and industrial relationships whilst respecting the equal roles of citizens, governments and the social partners.

The Report of the Director-General stresses the fact that the reinforcement of organisations of employers, as well as those of workers, is one of our urgent imperatives. It is in my opinion the ILO's responsibility to promote a legal and social framework which takes account of the new realities and which promotes the full autonomy of the social partners.

The Italian employers would like to see democratisation taking root as soon as possible but without too heavy costs being placed on the individual.

We are in favour of the promotion of productive investment in those areas where clear regulations and appropriate legislation can stimulate and protect foreign investment and ensure respect for the principles of the market and of democracy. The experience of Italian enterprises can offer examples of efficiency based on flexible technologies and market by innovation and this seems to us the best approach for the development of new enterprises which are competitive in the countries in transition.

The creation of joint ventures and the implementation of training programmes for employers in these countries, which we plan to organise, are pragmatic solutions which we propose in the belief that by injecting efficiency and productivity into the system, it is possible to make an effective contribution to solving the very serious social problems facing these countries.

Mr. PETKOV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the workers' organisations in Bulgaria, the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions (CITUB) and the Podkrepa Confederation of Labour. At the same time, I have the difficult task of informing you about the tendencies which threaten to undermine the process of democratisation and to render the representative role of the trade unions next to impossible. That is why we highly appreciate the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, which puts a finger on the sore place.

With your permission I will start with the good news first. In less than three years Bulgaria has joined the group of countries in Eastern Europe which have thrown off the totalitarian regime and given the new democratic forces a vote of confidence in free elections. The first non-Communist government in 45 years was formed; and the Parliament has approved a package of laws, including the Privatisation Act, which pave the way to a market economy. The rights of ethnic minorities are guaranteed and the forceable assimilation of the Turkish population has been discontinued.

It is unfortunate that a tendency of a different kind has been clearly noticeable since the end of last year. I am referring to the series of anti-trade union actions taken by the executive, judicial and legislative authorities in Bulgaria. These actions began with the confiscation of trade union property. This was done quickly in an austensible, legal disguise and with ideological arguments about the necessity to use sanctions against the former state and party-controlled trade unions. However, workers cannot – now or in the past – be held collectively responsible for having been forced to be union members and pay membership fees which were used to acquire property. Nor are they responsible for the manner of spending the means collected by them.

In taking away the property of the old trade unions, the State deprives all acting workers' organisations of resources for existence. At one blow, strike funds were swept away. This provoked our dispute with the state institutions which grew to become a serious confrontation. We are deeply convinced that we are right. Our arguments are strong and irrefutable, both from the viewpoint of the Bulgarian Constitution and under the Conventions and standards of the ILO.

The right of wage labour to freedom of association and property ownership is laid down in the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria. Despite this, the Confiscation Law was adopted and it is now in force. However, even its provisions are being violated everywhere. Buildings and premises of local and branch trade unions are being sealed off and seized and our employees and experts are being thrown out. State property was declared the assets of trade union newspapers and publishing houses.

Following an order issued by the Minister of Finance, offices are now being closed down and inventories are being made of resources collected in the past two years from subscriptions. This is a gross violation of article 56 of the Bulgarian Labour Code. The only "compromise" which the Government is inclined to make is to let us rent our own property or to grant credit under "favourable terms." What is expected in return is obedience from the trade unions.

The tripartite system of social partnership was abolished in November 1991. This act was followed by a massive campaign against the trade unions which were accused of all kinds of wrongdoings: organising conspiracies, being a mafia, being the greatest enemy of the economic reform, etc. An attempt was also made to deprive us of the right to collective bargaining through amendments in the Labour Code.

Moreover, after two trade union centres opposed the Government's decision in April to freeze wages, pensions and social benefits, the settlement of accounts began to take place through the court. Over a dozen lawsuits are now under-way against leaders of the CITUB and the Podkrepa Confederation of Labour. A screening law was also prepared but following public protest, including the representatives of European institutions, it was suspended. An attempt is now being made to pass discriminating legislation in disguise, through a new law on state employees and a new pension law.

I am not complaining; I am just making a statement. Nevertheless, it is a sad, even bitter, statement because it reveals an emerging danger for the democratic development of Bulgaria.

In the clash with the State the trade unions in Bulgaria rely primarily on themselves and defend their rights by all legitimate means. We appealed to the President to apply his veto right concerning this legislation; we used the mass media to explain our position; and we organised boycotts, warning strikes and effective strike action. Our response to the rejection of the tripartite cooperation were bilateral negotiations with the employers and the joint declaration concerning the economic policy. I would like particularly to stress that the joint declaration is in complete conformity with the statement of the ILO and the ICFTU, issued in the early spring of this year.

The coordinated pressure by the trade unions and the employers' organisations brought the first positive result. At the end of May the social partnership was restored and negotiations began on the compensation of wages, pensions and social benefits.

But the confiscation of property continued. The CITUB appealed on this issue to the Constitutional Court and is now waiting for its order. Our complaint was also already received by the ILO Freedom of Association Committee – Case No. 1623. Concerning the legal prosecutions against trade union leaders, we are going to make a representation in accordance with article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO; and we insist on an examination of these cases by the ILO.

Believe me, it is not a pleasant task to raise such issues at this Conference because it works against the country's prestige and the image of the fragile democracy in Bulgaria. However, democracy means publicity of conflicts, especially when fundamental worker and trade union rights are at stake – as in Bulgaria, Latvia and other countries.

The representative workers' organisations in Bulgaria have pledged their full support to the democratic changes, privaisation and the transition to a market economy. Consequently, no political grounds exist for the rising wave of anti-unionism. We only demand that the transformation of the centralised planned economy and the way out of the crisis be accompanied by the participation of wage labour and its representative organisations.

We believe that a clash between two concepts underlies the conflict between the Government and the trade unions. Neo-liberalism and extreme monetarism confront the concept of a market economy taking account of the social aspects.

The economic reform in Bulgaria started in February 1991. Today Bulgaria has to begin with macroeconomic stabilisation and a restrictive wage policy. Mass privatisation is about to be ushered in. In this situation it is hardly accidental that Bulgaria is being turned into a testing ground in the settlement of accounts with the trade unions which have been labelled as "enemy No. 1" of the economic reform.

Allow me to conclude by saying that we are well aware that in this difficult moment our position and steadfastness will be decisive. Yet we need understanding and support from the ILO. We already receive assistance in the area of workers' education; but the anti-unionism in Bulgaria has become official policy and this requires the particular attention of the ILO, a specialised and influential organisation.

Mr. IANNOU (Workers' delegate, Cyprus) – Please allow me to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of this session of the Conference.

The theme chosen by the Director-General for discussion at this year's session is without doubt the cornerstone of every society and every effort for prosperity, progress and social justice. They are the principles that give a meaning to life and safeguard human dignity. The individual, the basic cell of our society, aspires to a better future and a higher standard of living. By nature, the individual wants to satisfy both his material and spiritual needs, elements vital for proper development and for peaceful coexistence with other individuals within the fabric of society and the State.

If we separate these two fundamental elements and attempt in any way to deprive the individual of either one, then we unavoidable create conditions of conflict, leading us to oppression, violence and confrontation.

These fundamental needs of the individual can be satisfied only in conditions of democracy, freedom and peace, where the principles of equality, political rights and meritocracy prevail and where human and trade union rights are respected and guaranteed.

Countries and societies which for years were ruled by democratic regimes and respected human and trade union rights, have experienced progress and prosperity, whereas dictatorships and totalitarian regimes which violated these rights, have collapsed and left behind them an abundance of problems, misery and poverty, even though they assume power on the pretext of protecting the people and their interests from the exploitation of capital.

Democracy is not just theory. Democracy is a way of life. It is the respect of the right of the individual to think and express himself or herself freely, to have a choice of activity and enjoy free movement. To enjoy equal opportunities in life, to have the right of free association and collective bargaining and to elect the government of his or her country.

If we wish to have a peaceful future, we have to focus our attention on the measures and methods we must apply both at the national and international levels to protect and develop all those elements which contribute to the establishment of democracy and social justice.

The International Labour Organisation, with the principles it has been defending and promoting since its founding, with the manner in which it has set up its various instruments and with the Conventions and Recommendations it has approved from time to time, sets the foundations for the predominance of these principles in all countries, and on all the continents of our planet. The practical recognition by the ILO of the role of trade unions, employers' organisations and governments sets an example to all governments on how to rule and how to view the organisations in their dominion. The principles of democracy must become a way of life and encompass our economic and social sectors. Tripartite cooperation must not be applied only in theory within confined frames. It must be extended to cover all the activities affecting the lives of workers and all citizens. It is our opinion that the ILO, in the context of the programme for cooperation with governments, must take seriously into consideration whether these governments respect and uphold these principles. It is also essential that great care is taken for the further education and training of the population, especially trade unionists, as an additional factor for promoting the concepts of democracy, freedom and social justice.

Democracy, freedom, social justice and peace cannot be consolidated where human and trade union rights are being violated. Unfortunately, there still are countries which apply racial discrimination.

There are dictatorships which violate the fundamental rights of citizens. My organisation, which is a member of the free trade movement, will continue to give its solidarity and support to these peoples struggling for freedom and justice.

My country, Cyprus, is a democratic country. Since it became independent in 1960, Cyprus has recognised the human and trade union rights of all citizens and observes them in practice. The right of free association, the right to strike, the rights of free movement, free thought and expression are constitutionally guaranteed. Unfortunately, since 1974 my country has been divided. In July 1974, a neighbouring country invaded and still occupies a large part of my country by armed force, depriving the people of their fundamental human right. The army of occupation imposes constraints on the free movement of citizens, on ownership and on the free pursuance of work. It is impossible to extend social justice in the occupied area under such conditions. It is for this reason that workers in the occupied area have a lower standard of living than those living in the free areas.

The efforts of the workers of my country are focused towards the prevalence of the principles of the ILO for all the population throughout all the territory of our country. We seek the respect and observance of the rights of all citizens in order to promote the principles of democracy and social justice. We are struggling towards this goal and we hope that with the help of the United Nations and with international solidarity we will be able to pull down the wall that keeps the towns and villages of our country divided, like the Berlin Wall. We will struggle so that democracy and social justice are guaranteed by the legitimate Government for all citizens, irrespective of sex, religion or national origin. Until then, the free trade unions of our country will be at the vanguard of this struggle, because we believe in and we are committed to the ideals of freedom, democracy and social justice.

Credentials

Brief Report by Mr. Yvon Chotard, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference Geneva, 2 June 1992

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this article, it is for the governments to inform the International Labour Office of the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in Articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

In particular, paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on 2 June 1992 at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

To date, 126 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. It is to be noted that only 53 countries deposited the credentials of their delegations with the International Labour Office before 19 May 1992, that is within the 15 days deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which Article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, six countries (Afghanistan, Bolivia, Chad, Comoros, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea) had only nominated Government delegates, and four countries (Albania, Kyrgyzstan, Sudan, Suriname) had nominated a Workers' delegate but not am Employers' delegate.

It should be noted, finally, that in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organisations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organisation. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference, and Quorum

At present 247 Government delegates, 116 Employers' delegates and 120 Workers' delegates – a total of 483 delegates – are accredited to the Conference.

There are, in addition, 556 Government advisers, 298 Employers' advisers and 338 Workers' advisers – a total of 1,192 advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,675.

Since four States have nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate, four delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

Since nine of the States[1] now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organisation, those Members, under the terms of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees. Account is therefore not taken of a further 29 delegates in calculating the quorum.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organisation and with article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 225.

Observers

On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Holy See have appointed observer delegations to the Conference.

Organisations and liberation movements invited

The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph 1 – relating to reciprocal representation – of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Geneva, 2 June 1992

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

FIRST REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the first report of the Selection Committee; I call on Mr. Ali, Government delegate of Bangladesh and Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit this report to us.

Mr. ALI (Government delegate, Bangladesh; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the First Report of the Selection Committee which is contained in Provisional Record No. 6. It is divided into two parts. The first reproduces the decisions and recommendations that I announced orally to the Conference yesterday at its second sitting, and on which the Conference has already taken a decision.

The second part (Part B) contains the decisions and recommendations adopted by the Selection Committee at its second meeting, at 6 p.m. yesterday. Only Part B is therefore before the Conference for adoption now.

In Part B, the Selection Committee first makes recommendations to the Conference as to the composition of the Credentials Committee and the Drafting Committee of the Conference. Then, on the basis of proposals made by the Director-General at the invitation of the Governing Body, the Selection Committee has decided to convene a special sitting of the Conference to consider the Appendix to the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. It took this decision on the understanding that at that sitting speakers would confine their remarks to that Appendix and that, conversely, the subject would not be discussed in the framework of the debate on the remainder of the Report. It decided that the Special Sitting should be held on the afternoon of Tuesday, 16 June. The Selection Committee accordingly recommends the Conference to allow speakers who so wish to take the floor both on the General Report and during the Special Sitting.

In view of experience at the Special Sittings held during the sessions of the Conference in 1990 and 1991, and in particular of the large number of speakers who will probably wish to take the floor at the Special Sitting, it is likely that a shorter time-limit for speeches will be necessary, even if the sitting is extended. The Selection Committee has accordingly decided that the list of speakers will be closed at 6 p.m. on Friday, 12 June so as to enable the President to submit to the Conference for decision a proposal concerning the time-limit for speeches in the Special Sitting, taking due account of the number of speakers registered.

The Selection Committee also noted that the Director-General intended to devote a part of his comprehensive reply to the discussion of his Report to drawing lessons from the Special Sitting.

The Selection Committee also decided that certain committees should not meet at the same time as this Special Sitting.

Finally, the Selection Committee refers direct to the Conference a resolution concerning the procedure at the forthcoming Thirteenth Conference of American States Members of the ILO.

Lastly, I should like to point out that the lists of the composition of committees appended to the report take account of changes in composition that inevitably occurred after the initial announcement yesterday morning.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, we will take it that this report is adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Portuguese: the PRESIDENT – We now move on to the debate on the report of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. GOMEZ MERA (Minister for Labour and Human Resources, Ecuador) – On behalf of the Government of my country, I would like to congratulate the President on his successful election by this assembly. We will rely on his effective leadership in the debates of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents. I am sure that this Conference will fulfil its task and will adopt important decisions for all our countries.

The Government of the Republic of Ecuador, which I am honoured to represent, is very pleased to participate once again in the proceedings of this important international event which each year reviews the key issues in the world of work. Our major topic this year, as outlined in Director-General's Report, is the process of democratisation currently under way in member States, and the role of the ILO in this process. There is no doubt what is said here, including apparently opposite views, will enrich the debate.

I remember that three years ago, in this very forum, the Ecuadorian Government, which was then beginning its term of office in the midst of an unprecedented social, financial and economic crisis, proclaimed its decision to give priority attention to the adoption of a global policy of employment within an environment of authentic democracy, dialogue and full respect for human rights.

As first proof of its commitment to universally recognised principles, freedoms and human rights, and to its decision to promote the establishment and development of trade union organisations, in 1988 the Government recognised the legal personality of the Ecuadorian Confederation of United Workers' Organisations, thereby putting an end to a dispute which for more than a decade had pitted two of the country's four major workers' confederations against each other, and institutionalising its participation in the work of this Conference.

Having proclaimed its decision to fight unemployment – the major challenge of developing countries – it immediately deployed tremendous efforts and economic resources, both national and international, to establish job creation and social development programmes through the implementation of public works in economically depressed areas. At the same time it introduced special employment projects to provide permanent jobs for the most vulnerable social groups such as women, heads of household, young workers, the disabled, etc. Up to April of this year, some 205 million sucres had been invested in these projects.

In tandem with these direct job creation programmes, the Government established the first and most important national support programme for micro-enterprises through the concerted action of two ministries which were responsible for its implementation.

The Ministry of Employment and Human Resources alone provided 560 million sucres in loans to small producers and micro-enterprises and offered management training to 17,294 persons.

The Government has understood that there can be no economic and social development without education for workers and technical training for middle management. It has therefore put together at national level an extensive vocational training programme for the formal and informal sectors. To this end it has substantially improved the corresponding state infrastructure. It is with great satisfaction that we can report that from August 1988 to 1992 the Ecuadorian Vocational Training Service has trained 231,900 citizens.

All these actions to combat unemployment, hunger and social injustice would have been both useless and demagogic if at the same time we had not undertaken the essential task of pursuing democratisation and greater flexibility in the labour market, precisely in order to meet the employment needs of the Ecuadorian people and to improve the standards of living of the workers. These objectives, which are today common to both the developed countries of Europe and our own developing countries, made it essential to establish a legal framework which would encourage the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector, and at the same time offer security and guarantees to national, subregional and foreign investors.

Aware of this essential responsibility to change our legal structures, the Government has undertaken to promote major reforms of national legislation.

The tax reform, which has been in force since December 1989 and which is the first and most important of its sort in this century, has not only modernised procedures, replaced and unified taxes and enlarged the tax base to include those who were previously exempt, but has also freed from income tax workers who earn less than 2 million sucres per annum, and thus has increased their real income. Similar measures include tariff reforms and the creation of duty-free zones to make the country's international trade more flexible, and thereby to benefit production, trade, capital and labour.

This legal structure, instituted by the Government, is complemented with crucial measures to make the labour market more flexible through legislation on part-time work which allows employers to hire unemployed persons on a part-time basis, and on export-processing zones to generate direct and indirect sources of work and tax revenues for the country. In addition, the reform of the Act on handicrafts seeks to expand the size of artisanal workshops and to boost levels of employment in this field.

Of all the reforms in the labour field, perhaps the most controversial and important was the reform of the Labour Code, which was approved by the national Congress last year.

The controversy surrounding this particular measure has not yet subsided, and for this reason the Government would like to stress that it has acted in good faith to uphold national interests, to improve relations between employers and employees, to protect sources of employment and, above all, to comply fully with the labour guarantees and rights established in the national Constitution and in international conventions ratified by Ecuador.

In particular, I would like to stress certain aspects of the reforms which are certainly improvements in the protection of workers' rights. For the first time, the Labour Code grants a special job security of 12 months to workers engaged in collective bargaining; furthermore, it protects the right of workers to file grievances and appeals when their employer is contemplating the closing down of their workplace, and establishes two new grounds for strikes. It has also improved the scale of compensation for redundancy. It has incorporated the right to receive a prorated retirement pension with a minimum of 20 years of service. It has also improved the guarantee of job stability by abolishing dismissals without notice for persons with contracts of unlimited duration. It has also levied more severe fines on companies which fail to respect the law, and, in general, it has streamlined litigation and administrative procedures, for the benefit of both parties and of the national community.

There is absolutely no doubt that the controversy will continue, but we are certain that time will confirm the need, the advisability and the timeliness of these reforms.

As part of its policy of ongoing dialogue with the social partners, the Government has enthusiastically advocated the adoption of a social pact between employers, workers and the Government with a view to putting a halt to inflation, which erodes the purchasing power of the Ecuadorian people. Although our efforts have not been successful, we are certain that under the next Government, whatever its composition, the social pact will become a reality since it is no longer possible for interest groups to work simply for their own short-term interests, disregarding the future of the country as a whole.

This philosophy has led Ecuador, in the context of the Subregional Andean Integration Agreement, to approve the Labour and Social Charter which enshrines the fundamental rights and guarantees of workers and employers in the Andean zone in these times of economic liberalisation. There is absolutely no doubt that the adoption of this instrument goes well beyond the interests any single government; indeed, it is directly relevant to all workers of the region.

Democracy, together with social justice, is the only guarantee for peace in the world, as the Director-General has quite rightly pointed out in his brilliant Report. We are very proud of the fact that such transcendental issues lie at the heart of the International Labour Conference.

Once again, I would like to express my wish for the President's success in his delicate task, and the hope that this Conference will fully meet its aims and objectives.

Mr. WIJETUNGE (Prime Minister and Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Sri Lanka) – I must begin by congratulating the President, on his election to this very esteemed office. I have no doubt that his distinguished background, experience and wisdom will guide the affairs of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference towards a fruitful and successful conclusion.

I am fortunate, indeed, to be able to address this august assembly. I am present here both in my capacity as Prime Minister and in that of Minister of Labour and Vocational Training of Sri Lanka. I convey to you the warmest greetings and best wishes from His Excellency Ranasinghe Premadasa, the President of Sri Lanka.

Heading the items placed on the agenda for this Conference is the subject of protecting workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. The agenda gives the term "insolvency" an extension in meaning to include situations in which a government decides to close a state enterprise for economic reasons. It might interest you to know that this has indeed been a subject of current interest and application in Sri Lanka. In a broad-based approach to privatisation, our Government is currently engaged in converting state commercial enterprises into private companies. The objective of our Government is to create a share-owning democracy. In doing so, we have taken special steps to ensure the protection of workers' rights: firstly, 10 per cent of the shares of a company are given free of charge to workers; secondly, we have legislative restrictions regarding termination of employment; thirdly, all employees' provident fund and other protectionary benefits will continue to accrue to the worker. Our desire is to see that these undertakings, under private sector management, become more efficient and viable, thereby resulting in greater capabilities to give more benefits to the worker. Thus our rationale for privatisation also takes the workers' interest into account.

This 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time when momentous events of great potential impact on human civilisation are taking place around the globe. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO captures the spirit of this global situation. The theme of his Report is democratisation. In my view the concept of democratisation encapsulates the most important events of our time. Democratic forces are sweeping over the world in a manner and scale that has never been seen in the past.

The cry everywhere is for political freedom and human rights. Participation and sharing in decision-making are replacing command styles of management. Totalitarian structures are crumbling against the human assertion for liberty.

The Director-General in his Report refers to the principle of alternating power and the recognition of the rights of the opposition. This is the essence of the democratic way of life. In democracies dissent is institutionalised and respected. We in Sri Lanka have for well over four decades been enjoying a vibrant democracy. The smooth transition of power from one political party to another has taken place with marked regularity, giving expression to the principle of alternating power mentioned by you.

We also believe that economic liberalisation is a prerequisite for the democratic way of life. The Sri Lankan Government has over the last decade, and especially under President Premadasa, been systematically removing the shackles of state control over the economy and has been granting greater and greater incentives to the private individuals to develop their business capabilities. This has shown dramatic results in the way of unprecedented foreign investment, the remarkable strengthening of our stock market and an impressive growth rate despite the disturbing conditions in one part of our country.

For democratic institutions to survive in a country, supportive internal and external conditions must exist. Internally, poverty, unemployment, malnutrition and illiteracy cannot yield democratic and participative institutions. Such situations can only provide a happy breeding ground for totalitarian and fascist-oriented vested interests which are able to set up machineries of power under various euphemisms which cloak their real intentions to subvert the rights of the people. I do not need to cite examples as history is replete with such instances.

The external conditions I referred to emerge from the international order. Firstly, a supportive political order must prevail which respects the rights of nations and discourages interferences in their internal administration. Individual nations should be left to find their own solutions to their unique problems. Secondly, I wish to emphasise very specially the urgent need for a new international economic order which would be equitable towards the vast majority of countries peopled by the poor and the downtrodden. Is it not a sad commentary on the human community to state that although we are on the threshold of the twenty-first century, more than half the world population lives in misery and want?

The ILO ideals of international social justice can only be achieved if a greater sense of international brotherhood is developed and nurtured. In this regard we all have reason to feel happy about the demolition of iron curtains symbolically heralded by the dismantling of the Berlin Wall. We are also happy to see the situation in South Africa easing considerably. We are hopeful that the coming months and years will strengthen these forces of unity.

The globe we all inhabit and share is getting smaller and smaller by a corresponding increase over the years in facilities for human contact. The rapid march of technology is, in a very real sense, compelling linkage among people and nations all over the world. The world order of the era prior to the 1980s is yielding and giving place to a new vista where global co-operation and integration would be the only formula for human survival.

I would like to conclude my speech with a traditional Buddhist invocation: "May all beings be well and happy".

Mr. LEE (Minister for Labour, Singapore) – On behalf of the Singapore delegation I would like to joing the previous speakers in extending our warmest congratulations to the President on his election to the chair of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am confident that under his leadership this Conference will proceed expeditiously to a fruitful conclusion.

We are meeting during a period of economic uncertainty. Growth in OECD countries has slowed down since the second half of 1991. While there are tentative signs of economic recovery in the United States, the situation is less sanguine in Germany and Japan. Unless the situation improves, it is not likely that many of us in the developing countries will see further growth this year.

Unemployment remains an issue of concern in the OECD as well as in many developing countries. The growing numbers of unemployed is a destabilising factor in many countries. It is therefore timely that the Governing Body has given priority to a general discussion on adjustment and human resources development.

Human resources development is an important prerequisite for sustained economic growth. The experience of Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong demonstrates the importance of human resources development. These are human resource based economies as against a natural resource based economy. The so-called NIEs, or Newly Industrialising Economies have concentrated their human resources development towards applied science and technology which are vital disciplines for economic progress and transformation. By doing so they have been able to enhance their economic competitiveness and have achieved prosperity.

Apart from human resources development, these economies have also established industrial relations systems characterised by high productivity and less antagonistic labour-management relations. In contrast, the occurrence of frequent industrial unrest in various countries is a clear message for us that we cannot take harmonious industrial relations for granted. The fragile relationship between labour and management can be easily disrupted, as exemplified by the recent strikes over pay hikes in Germany. There is a need for each country to strengthen labour-management linkages which maximise constructive discussions between labour and management. It is better to avoid the enormous cost of industrial unrest than to repair the damage resulting from neglect of labour-management relations.

My country, Singapore, is also very much dependent on our human resources for economic development. Our approach is to treat human resources development as a joint responsibility of the Government, employers and workers. In 1979, we set up a Skills Development Fund (SDF) for the post-employment training of our workers. The SDF encourages employers to train their workers by providing cash grants to employers. All employers with workers earning $750 or less a month contribute to the SDF. The fund is managed by a tripartite Advisory Council.

Turning to a different issue, I note that the Governing Body has also included on the agenda the subject of the prevention of industrial disasters. A safe and healthy work environment is essential to raising productivity. In Singapore, the safety and health of workers is safeguarded through workers' training, the monitoring of working conditions and the enforcement of the law. To keep pace with the changing industrial profile, our law has been amended to include protection for more workers in a wide variety of working environments. Compulsory medical examinations are also extended to occupations with specific chemical and physical hazards.

My Government also recognises that employers and workers can make significant contributions to the Government's enforcement measures. More than 95 per cent of factories in Singapore which employ 50 or more workers now have safety committees comprising management and worker representatives. These committees provide front-line defence against industrial accidents. As a result of these measures, the industrial accident rates in Singapore are now comparable to that of the developed countries.

While short-term economic prospects remain uncertain, in the longer term prospects remain bright. The end of the cold war has spawned optimism world wide. Countries can now focus their attention on economic development rather than squabble over ideological differences.

History shows that countries which have adopted the free enterprise approach have managed to provide better standards of living for their people: better jobs, better health care, more homes and consumer goods. Those countries that have tried centralised state planning are now faced with economic stagnation and declining standards of living.

More and more countries now appreciate the virtues and benefits that free enterprise brings. They also realise that promoting international trade and foreign investment is the way to economic progress. Indeed, over the past four decades world trade has grown at a faster rate than world Gross Domestic Product (GDP).

It is therefore ironic that despite the manifest advantages of free trade, protectionist sentiments are now on the rise. The trend can be seen in the frequent emphasis by many countries on "fair trade" rather than "free trade". Very often "fair trade", which is hard to define, becomes "protected trade". We can understand why, in some cases, domestic political considerations may require economically unsound solutions. Hence, protection of domestic employment is often cited as the reason for trade barriers. However, if governments increasingly rely on unilateral measures rather than work within the framework of GATT to resolve trade inbalances, we can expect to see more trade disputes and economic stagnation.

Unfortunately, the GATT Uruguay Round has been stalled for two years. It is beset with problems of prolonged and bitter negotiations over the question of farm subsidies. It is imperative for all of us that the Uruguay Round succeeds. If it does, it will provide a boost to world trade. If it fails, the world will see the emergence of protective trade blocs and bilateral deals. We would have lost the opportunity to reap the vast potential that free trade can bring. On a brighter note, a broad agreement on a new European farm policy has been reached recently, and it is our hope that this will provide the impetus to revive the stalled trade talks.

The ILO has made a valuable contribution to the improvement of the health, welfare and conditions of employment of workers around the world. Such improvements have been made possible in conjunction with the policies of governments and other international organisations, such as the World Bank and GATT. Continued success will depend on countries keeping the international trading and investment system unfettered and open. The ILO has an important role, together with other international organisations, to remove barriers against free trade. Only with free trade can countries hope to achieve economic growth, to create employment opportunities and to provide a better life for workers everywhere.

Mr. ARISTIDOU (Minister of Labour and Social Insurance, Cyprus) – On behalf of the Cyprus delegation may I congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I have no doubt that under his able guidance, the Conference will have constructive debates and reach a successful conclusion to its deliberation.

This year's theme of the Report of the Director-General, Democratisation and the ILO, is very topical given the increasing number of countries which have deliberately opted for a democratic form of government combined with a more or less decided preference for a market economy. The time is indeed ripe for the ILO to define with greater precision the nature of its contribution to current trends. Marking out a framework within which the ILO can be of assistance in fostering democracy, ensuring that economic and social policies assist in the building of democratic regimes and in meeting the demands of social justice, is a task which cannot be postponed. I feel that it is our responsibility to support and assist the ILO in defining its role, not only by taking a stand on the suggestions made by the Director-General in his Report, but also by sharing our experiences in this respect. The ILO, because of its tripartite nature, is in a unique position to undertake this task.

Speaking at the Tripartite Symposium on New Perspectives for Tripartism in Europe last April in Brussels, I stressed that "tripartism is not only a methodology for doing things in the economic, social and labour fields, but it could also become the answer to what mankind has been trying to find or invent, i.e. a social system which, on the one hand, will preserve and enhance the strength and the competitiveness of the economy and, on the other hand, promote and maintain social justice, within a democratic system of government".

Since ancient times, philosophers and political thinkers have tried to define democracy. From the simple etymological meaning, that is, power in the hands of the people, the concept has, as pointed out by the Director-General, expanded to include political freedom, freedom of opinion and expression, equality of opportunity, impartiality of justice, rule of law, operation of organised opposition and the idea of sharing social and economic power. This wider meaning ties the individual freedom and the plurality of interest with participation in social and economic development. For, as rightly underlined in the Report, "the participation of all in social and economic life is the embodiment of genuine democracy", and "economic efficiency is intimately linked to dialogue between the social partners".

In Cyprus, we have long recognised the close relationship between democracy, economic development and social justice. Since the establishment of the Republic, we have adopted a mixed approach to the management of the economy. We have encouraged the operation of free market and price mechanisms as the major means for the allocation of resources, and we have tempered the functioning of free market forces through indicative planning and limited government intervention. The Government has provided the general policy framework through its fiscal and monetary measures, the creation of the basic economic and social infrastructure, and the establishment of the institutional and legal framework.

Within the framework of our policy to create the right institutional set-up, we have continuously tried to involve employers' associations, trade unions, farmers and other interested groups in both the processes of indicative planning and of market intervention. It is our belief that participation not only is a democratic method but it contributes also to the acceptance and, therefore, the eventual success, of various policies and programmes. In the process of indicative planning, in particular, participation was sought of as many social groups as practically possible, that is without undermining expertise or hampering the process of decision-making.

Referring in particular to the broad area of strengthening the economy, which has been identified by the Director-General as one in which the ILO should specifically direct its attention, we would agree with the assertion that no political regime and no economic system can expect to survive unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of its population and creating sufficient, productive and useful employment. And these must be done within systems of social protection, which in their turn will ensure political stability, social solidarity and cohesion. Thus, the ILO should become a focal point of action and play a leading role in helping countries to set up an environment conducive to the process of democratisation, to advance economic development and employment and to develop a system of social protection tailored to their needs and resources.

Drawing from our own experience we unhesitatingly endorse proposed ILO action in areas such as structural adjustment, liberalisation of markets, rural development, enterprise and co-operation creation, employment and training.

Cyprus has acquired over the years extensive experience, inter alia, in the field of small enterprise development and in the more general field of labour administration, including industrial relations and labour inspection. We are ready to share this experience with other countries in the same way we have done in the past through inter-regional seminars organised jointly with the ILO. Cyprus is a small economic and social workshop that has proved itself in many ways.

The ILO is well aware of Cyprus's commitment to the principles of tripartism and social dialogue. The almost miraculous revival of the Cyprus economy after the 1974 invasion would not have been possible without close tripartite cooperation. The philosophy of tripartism was the cornerstone not only of the economic revival but also of the socio-economic progress before and after 1974 – including the high growth rate of per capita income and the substantial upgrading of our social security system. More specifically, economic, labour and social policies have been formulated in consultation with the representative workers' and employers' organisations, through a wide network of permanent and ad hoc tripartite committees. New forms of tripartite cooperation are being introduced all the time – especially in the areas of economic efficiency and productivity.

Encouraging a market economy with a social dimension and strengthening tripartism and collective bargaining are indeed important areas for ILO action. Yet, the most important area in which, in our view, the attention of countries wishing to foster democracy should be directed is that of the respect for fundamental human rights. The ILO should give its wholehearted support to the efforts of member States to establish a framework of laws and regulations guaranteeing respect for human rights and adequate protection of the rights of the workers. Special attention should be devoted to activities aiming at combating all forms of de jure and de facto discrimination which promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of access to employment and conditions of employment as well as to activities aiming at ensuring equality of men and women in employment and occupation.

Our all-round success so far, despite all adversities, was made possible because Cyprus is a democratic society where human rights and fundamental freedoms are guaranteed. The Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus prohibits any racial prejudice or racial discrimination and provides for the full and effective protection of human rights including civil and political, social, economic and cultural rights. Under the Cyprus Constitution, the functioning of a liberal and democratic State, as well as the parallel development of a modern welfare State, is guaranted to every citizen without discrimination.

Furthermore, the Republic of Cyprus has signed, ratified or acceded to all important international Conventions relating to the protection of human rights.

Despite the systematic and unremitting efforts exerted by the Government, the people of Cyprus as a whole have been deprived of the possibility of the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms because of the 1974 invasion and occupation of 37 per cent of its territory.

As a result of the occupation, the Government of Cyprus is prevented from exercising its full responsibility for the implementation of all its obligations under the various international Conventions on its whole national territory, and the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the people continue to be violated.

In conclusion, I would fully agree that the ILO should play a primary role in the democratisation process of the world. With its long experience and unique expertise in the setting of social standards and the development of institutions, with its successful record for human rights, freedom, collective responsibility, economic development, human resource efficiency, and social equality principles, the ILO is well-equipped to assist the countries in the throes of transformation and to play a leading role in the global efforts to eliminate poverty, to establish democracy firmly, and to promote social justice on all continents.

Cyprus, even though striving for a solution to its own problems, is quite willing to contribute, however marginally, to this great effort of mankind, for the benefit of peace, social equality and prosperity for all.

Mr. MIFSUD-BONNICI (Minister of Education and Human Resources, Malta) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election to preside over the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The question of adjustment and human resources development which has been put on the agenda was prompted by the structural adjustments made necessary because of the sweeping economic and, I add, political changes that have occurred in the last few years all over the world. These structural adjustments will precipitate further changes in working conditions. While the changes were brought about largely by the maturing of political events, which can fairly be described as a renaissance of democracy, it is still painfully evident that full democratisation is far from being achieved. It is increasingly evident that the further realisation of democracy as a way of life permeating all aspects of human activity faces major obstacles, which lie in the larvae of former oppressive systems with which our societies are still largely bestrewn, and in the lack of proper education. All the problems of labour are compounded by a lack of proper education and training. In seeking solutions to most labour problems, in addition to tackling the present contingency one should also address oneself to the proper planning of educational, training and retraining programmes. Most of the problems hindering the smooth functioning of democracy can be traced to lack of education.

In development, in labour conditions, in the enactment and implementation of social security legislation and in occupational health and safety standards most imbalances arise out of perhaps historically explainable deficiencies in the educational infrastructure. It is vital to spread the conviction that no real development, no real progress, no real sustainable development, no real environmental conservation, no real transfer of technology, no real social justice can take place without the even spread of education. Formal democracy, even though it is a boon, cannot alone be true participatory democracy without education of a sufficiently high level, such as is compatible with human dignity for the conduct of community affairs.

This realisation should transcend the political particularities of the reasons for structural adjustments. It should also transcend geography. Indeed, the adjustments from centrally planned economies in the former communist states and the adjustments from high-handed dirigism in the case of dictatorial regimes, notwithstanding the evident differences in development and the imperatives of redevelopment of these systems, both require a basic realignment of human resources and a new way of looking at interpersonal and citizen-state relationships.

Perhaps one has to explain that, when speaking of education, we are not restricting the phrase to the early scholastic stage. Indeed, if education involves the "whole" man, it cannot exclude his very human aspect as the homo faber, the transformer of the goods of the earth into others needed as food, clothing, or for the satisfaction of so many physical, psychological or spiritual needs. Nor can education exclude the social aspect, which includes the delegation of one's power to be governed by others. The basics of primary and, I would venture to say, secondary education, are indeed fundamental to a proper modern societal preparation of the citizen of any country.

We are well aware of the fact that most countries outside Europe, North America and Japan are an appreciable distance away from the achievement of this goal. But it must be emphasised as an aim none the less. There is a constant temptation to discount the importance of the acquisition of primary and secondary education by the whole of the young age cohorts of all countries, and some developing countries may impatiently try short cuts which do away with this wise and indeed basic itinerary. In my own country, some years back, an experiment was tried under which instruction was given in a craft or trade before a proper grounding in academic subjects was completed, and we are now realising that premature vocational training does not give the proper results and that it disperses human resources. Indeed one of the reforms that we are at present effecting is that of postponing further entry into vocational school by one year. With training and, indeed, retraining programmes coming more and more into play in the implementation of developmental policy, there is all too clearly a need for people educated during their early and middle years of schooling. Such people are required for specialisation and respecialisation in the increasingly technologically advanced methods of work. I might perhaps dare to add that the transfer of technology is impossible without a primary and secondary, and perhaps post-secondary, schooling base.

What, however, should be further understood is that the consensus about the need to provide this educational infrastructure cannot be established merely by the pleading of philosophers, of economists and educators, or indeed by people in government or the mass media. The other social partners, organised labour and organised employers, have to make their contribution. Unions may sometimes be forgiven the fact that they tend to give paramount importance to the present and to the immediate future. The day-to-day pressures that attract immediate attention are such that the provision of proper education for tomorrow's working class might not be given its place among their priorities. As for employers, while they criticise the fact that the product of state and non-state educational establishments do not meet the requirements, and while they suggest remedies, they too sometimes succumb for understandably profitable but myopically unwise reasons to the temptation to employ prematurely the half-trained raw recruit.

Report VI refers to the threat posed to the education budget and allocations made for training and retraining when the economic situation demands a reduction in expenses which are not deemed to be on the highest scales of priority. The Report analyses such occurrences in various countries and suggest strategies. It is said that basic education suffers most. Reference is made to the role of teachers' unions and to methods of lobbying against cuts in the education budget. A rather great deal of reliance is placed on the wisdom of governments. I would plead for a more tripartite approach. All workers' unions, and not solely teachers' unions, have a stake in maintaining high investment in education. The ascension towards an ultimate state of true human dignity for the worker can only be performed through education. Again, workers' unions may be asked to show greater interest in the scholastic base rather than vocational education and training. Likewise all employers should now begin to realise that any premature employment before education and training have been completed may be profitable in the short run, but is ultimately wasteful and less than wise. Employers' associations have been known to be vociferous on matters of fiscal policy, but have been shy in exercising any pressure in defence of the education budget. Ultimately, however, the major responsibilities for prioritising the even spread of basic primary and secondary education and of providing adequate vocational training rests on the whole body politic and its political leaders.

Investment in education bears fruit a hundred times over, and this applies to all levels. The multiplier effect of tertiary education should not be overlooked at any stage.

In the government reshuffle which followed our election in February of this year, the Prime Minister decided to assign responsibility for labour matters to the Minister of Education, with an expanded title to include "and Human Resources". The thinking behind this arrangement is to make the relationship between education, training, retraining, guidance and placement more functional and direct. We believe it is a step in the right direction. Perhaps closer interaction between education and labour should be one of the aims of government structural adjustments. Moreover, this attitude should bring about similar thinking among the organised social partners. Better education is the worker's best friend and better education is the employer's best asset in making use of human resources.

May I also venture to suggest that better education may not only help workers to be much more aware of their rights and duties, but would smooth relations between labour unions and employers. Through education, worker participation in industry is made more sensible and useful. The complications arising from misunderstandings and lack of comprehension are often not only time-consuming but have a marked retarding effect on development.

There may be some doubt as to whether education could be the cure-all for social ills and dysfunctions. However, people in government all over the world cannot disregard the indicators pointing to the fact that no development can in fact occur without the spread of education, and that all restructuring is to a great extent conditioned by the availability or non-availability of education.

May I also stress that if development without a good groundwork in primary and secondary education is a mirage, democracy built on prevailing ignorance may be very illusory. We have seen that there is no guarantee of workers' rights without liberty and democracy, and that economic prosperity without the constitutional climate of liberty and democracy is very short-lived. One would therefore be very wise to stress not only the importance of democratisation and the vested interest that workers and entrepreneurs have in fostering it, but also the primary role of the spread of education in ensuring the well-being and dignity of every man and woman within a democracy. If democracy is the only civilised way for human beings to govern themselves, it is also the product of culture and of the shared culture of a people. Ultimately, we cannot have a ubiquitous democracy without the general spread of education.

Original – Portuguese: The President – I would ask delegates kindly not to forget the rule adopted by our Conference according to which the presentations of all speakers should not exceed ten minutes.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ANTONIOLI VASQUEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Peru) – I am greatly honoured to be participating in this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and I bring with me the greetings of the people and Government of Peru to all brother delegations represented in this august assembly. This session of the Conference is beginning under the best possible auspices. The election of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to direct our work is a clear recognition of his personal and professional gifts and of those of the Officers of the Conference. They are a sure guarantee of a successful outcome of this session. We should also like to extend our greetings to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, and to his staff.

The subject chosen by the Director-General for the Report this year, Democratisation and the ILO is of great interest to us and we agree with much of its contents. The Government of President Alberto Fujimori agrees with the Director-General when he says that democratisation is but the action whereby a people assumes responsibility for itself and all its component parts, exactly, as individuals and their families shape their own destiny and that democracy requires that everyone should participate in political power and in economic responsibility. Likewise, when he says that nothing is further removed from democracy than the identification of society with a single party or union of parties, either for or against the State. In a democratic system, there is no monopoly, either by the government in office or the opposition. Democracy recognises the diversity of interests and it is the responsibility of the authorities to define and implement the general orientations of the public interest. Democracy is not merely the act of depositing a paper in a ballot box; without participation in public life, democracy would be unable to fulfil the aspirations of the people and would simply be void.

I believe I am right in saying that we all agree with what was said by the Director-General in his Report and I am sure that it will be of great assistance in clarifying and understanding the current situation in Peru.

We have directed our efforts to achieving the democratisation of society, by setting up mechanisms for participation by our citizens in controlling any excesses of power. We believe that in this way the people will be able to play a moralising role, obliging those who are elected or appointed to fulfil their obligations. We wish to promote a market economy within a legal framework which provides security and guarantees for industry, trade, private property, enhancing at the same time the efficiency of judiciary by simplifying administrative procedures and reorganising public administration in order to provide better services to all natural and legal persons, be they nationals or foreign and to achieve economic stability which the country needs so much.

I wish to stress that the fundamental rights and duties of persons enshrined in our Constitution remain fully in force and have not been impaired in the slightest.

The convening of a constituent congress for 18 October next by the President of the Republic will allow us to move from an imperfect democracy to a genuinely representative democracy in which all the levels of our political, economic and social organisations, will participate, including above all the social partners – in other words, the workers and employers.

When President Fujimori assumed power on 28 July 1990, we knew that our labour legislation was often bombastic, contradictory, ambiguous and anachronistic and very often the source of labour disputes. The intervention of the State was constant, restrictive, peremptory and exclusive. It limited or even cancelled collective autonomy and its major manifestations – in other words, self-organisation, regulatory autonomy and self-governance.

A programme of priority actions was drawn up, covering such subjects as youth employment; labour administration; labour stability; compensation for length of service; collective and individual labour relations.

In 20 months we made little headway. The Bill on strikes of 1982 was not debated, neither was the General Labour Act. The Labour Relations Act submitted in April 1991 was approved only as regards section 1; and the decree guaranteeing compensation for length of service was annulled without any legal justification.

From 5 April 1992, we have been implementing a programme of vocational and pre-vocational training for young persons through Legislative Decree No. 728. We have restored the compensation for length of service which workers receive even when enterprises close down. The Labour Relations Act includes the right to association, collective bargaining and strikes, and is now ready for promulgation. All that remains to be done as part of the democratisation policy concerning State decisions is for, the Council of Ministers to give its prior authorisation for its publication in the Official Gazette so that those concerned can express their criticisms and observations.

I once again would like to express my agreement with the Director-General when he says that democratisation is the symbol of the aspirations of mankind and the depository of hope for a better life. We believe it also very important that the ILO should retain and strengthen its specific role within the international system of aid to development and on behalf of social justice.

We would like to express our gratitude for the ILO's readiness vis-à-vis its Members to deal with all requests for assistance in creating effective and efficient labour administration services and in rationalising employment and labour inspection services. We are engaged in this task in our country.

We cherish the hope that our discussions will lead to a consensus which reflects not only of the expectations of the participants in this session of the Conference but also the concerns of our times, in which are witnessing major changes and upheavals and the reaffirmation of democracy which, along with social justice, is the sole guarantee for world peace.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. MELLAO NETO (Minister of State for Labour and Administration, Brazil) - Firstly, I should like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, President of this Conference, and say what a great pleasure it is for us as Brazilians to have a representative of Portugal as President of the Conference. Brazil is a sister nation.

When, more than two centuries ago, economists defined the three factors of production – land, capital and labour – humanity was just embarking on what was known as the industrial economy. Later it could be seen that, as a result of this, all economic social, and cultural values of civilisation were revolutionised, but the concept of labour, on the threshold of this new era, was very rudimentary. In order to enter the labour market, a worker at least needed to possess the concept of discipline, punctuality, obedience and method. It was therefore necessary to rapidly turn rough and ready peasants into a labour force able to carry out automatic, synchronised and repetitive tasks which were part and parcel of manufacturing activities.

From then, until the first half of this century, it was believed that the labour factor was of secondary importance in creating wealth. It was the land with its mineral resources and capital, together with technology, that were the driving force behind economic development.

At the end of the Second World War the elite started to re-examine this idea. Europe had been reduced to ashes, Japan had been brought to heel, with its physical assets that had been accumulated during centuries, severely depleted. Were these countries therefore condemned, for a further two centuries, to rebuild everything that had been created during the previous two centuries? Those who were responsible for the Marshall Plan thought this should not be the case. The human capital remained: workers who for many generations had been educated and trained were ready to work, and it was this source which represented in fact the wealth of nations. With just 28 million dollars, the amount made available by the Marshall Plan, Europe was able to rebuild its economy in one decade alone with productivity of work growing at spectacular rates of 6.8 per cent per year.

Of course the plan was sound. Fertile soil was being cultivated. Take everything from a person, and he still shall be able to bounce back, if his wisdom remains. If we look at what happened shortly after with underdeveloped nations, we see that 700 billion dollars were invested through petrol dollars in backward countries during the seventies. And what were the results of this great investment in capital? Virtually none.

The difference in the second case in underdeveloped nations was that fertile soil was sown. Great numbers of illiterate, underfed people, untrained and unskilled workers were not suitable receivers. It was impossible to break away from this vicious circle, no matter how much was invested in a physical infrastructure. A prosperous upper middle class developed amongst those who had already basic knowledge, the majority, however, remained in the same situation as before, excluded from the development process, living in subhuman conditions and helping to increase social inequalities with badly distributed incomes. Appropriate investments were not made in training and informing workers and investment was not made in any nation's main asset: the people who live and work there.

I come from a country which has suffered from this strategic disarray. What we have failed to invest in education and training in the past, we are paying for today through poverty and criminality which threatens our large towns.

It is vital that profound and important changes be made in our development model. Brazil today is governed by a young progressive president who has accepted the challenge to re-examine his programme of work, change his values and rid himself of preconceived ideas. The great historic work of our President Fernando Collor de Mello, is certainly that of having invited intellectuals and the elite to re-examine entrenched certainties. The economy has been opened up. We have broken down the barriers to imports and market reserves are being depleted. Although our economy is still suffering from the effects of these corrections, throughout the country as a whole, the watchwords are productivity and competativeness and in order to achieve this it is necessary to believe in the potential and the ingenuity of the individual, through the free market and a state which is committed to overcoming shortfalls in food supplies and education.

I have been Minister of Labour for only two months now. I understand how great my task is. Brazil has today almost 22 million adolescents and adults who are lacking in schooling, are illiterate or have less than four years' basic education. Fifty-two per cent of our workers never got beyond the first stage of basic education.

Extra schooling through an ambitious programme of training and providing skills one of my priorities. There is no way of distributing income in a nation where tens of millions of workers lack skills, are undernourished and produce nothing.

For such an urgent task we need technical and economic co-operation from more experienced nations, and from international organisations, particularly from the UNDP and the ILO. If on the one hand, we are opening up the potential of our economy to international markets, on the other hand, we hope that there will be a number of benefits from nations who will set up a series of co-operation programmes with us so that we can train our labour force and build up our human assets.

Other nations who in the past have invested in training labour have been able in the space of one decade to break away from the vicious circle of poverty and today are able to compete as equals with more developed economies.

Brazil, under the management of President Fernando Collor de Mello and with my own co-operation is now taking up the challenge and expect solidarity from all the members of this plenary.

We are planting corn and will have a harvest for one year, are cultivating orchids and will have a harvest for five years. But what we want to do is to have harvests for many decades and centuries.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-SABAH (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me to start by congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of this Conference. I wish him every success in his work during this session and I trust, thanks to the efforts by representative of member States, we shall be able to build a world full of social justice and attain the targets anchored in the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I should like, on this occasion, to pay tribute to the Director-General for the theme that he has selected for his Report this year: Democratisation and the ILO. The world is in the process of change towards democratisation and the respect of civil freedoms; and this is the essential objective and target of the Organisation in its moves to achieve international peace.

In this respect, I would like to refer to some remarks that are contained in the Report of the Director-General. First, building a new world order has become a vital necessity and I believe this is one of the essential objectives in the relationship between people and States in our modern society. This order brings home two basic features: democracy and freedom. The rapid changes that many countries and States have undergone is, I believe, a striking example of the goodwill of the States to implement this new international order.

Second, the right of self-determination of States and peoples is essential in order to strengthen peace and do away with conflicts and ambitions that have been a direct cause of many regional wars – resulting in a loss of human and material resources and failing to resolve any problems. On the contrary, I believe they brought about tensions and frictions which still exist today. We thus have to take a firm stand to do away with these ambitions, reinforce freedom and independence and condemn regional and international conflicts.

Third, the ILO can look back to a glorious past in democratic change and the implementation of principles of freedom. Since its inception in 1991, the Organisation has been based on tripartism: workers, employers and government representatives participate in the work of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body and all other activities of the Organisation. This co-operation is reflected in Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO.

Fourth, governments and peoples throughout the world look to the ILO to strive for democracy, strengthen tripartism and defend freedoms and human rights.

Fifth, since my country became a member of the ILO in 1961, we have honoured and respected these principles and objectives by ratifying international labour standards, while also respecting human rights and social objectives. Moreover, my country provides financial support for trade union activities and encourages them to serve the interests of the workers. Kuwait has also introduced the principle of tripartite negotiations between workers and employers in the case of a dispute. Our State is founded on freedom and liberty. We provide social protection and material assistance to those who are needy. There is free education, free medical care and housing; and we also do our best to guarantee our citizens a dignified life. Our labour legislation grants rights to workers and their application is monitored carefully by the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour. What is more, workers may bring their grievances before the courts.

On behalf of my country and my Government, I would urge you to exercise pressure on the Iraqi regime to free the prisoners and hostages they captured on 2 August 1990. They are being detained unjustly and must be given the chance to return to their families and to their country in accordance with the relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions. I call upon you to make this noble gesture so that the ILO may fulfil its role to strengthen peace throughout the world. I hope that our deliberations will be crowned with success so that we might attain the ILO's objectives in order to guarantee a better future and create a world in which conflicts and wars are absent.

Mr. FOKEER (Minister of Labour and Industrial Relations, Mauritius) – It is a great honour for me and for my country to be given the opportunity to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me to start by congratulating the President on his election to the Chair of this year's meeting in the name of the whole delegation from Mauritius. We all rejoice at the unanimous choice because we have confidence in his wisdom and his will to bring the meeting to a fruitful conclusion. Our congratulations go also to the Vice-Chairmen.

I am proud to say that 1992 is yet another landmark in the constitutional evolution of my country. Twenty-four years after independence, Mauritius has acceded to the status of a republic and a son of the soil is now the Head of State. This has been achieved in the traditional form of democracy to which we remain jealously committed. Indeed, we reaffirm solemnly our will to peace, to the defence of human rights and to social justice, for we have the experience that societies with democratic values have developed with consensus and have prospered.

But still, like most sister countries in the South, we face 1992 with mixed feelings. If the 1980s have been the lost decade for Africa, the start of the 1990s has not shown the evolution which was expected in spite of promises and hopes created by the tide of democracy which has swept across the world. The economies of many nations continue to be assailed by difficulties and still present the same morose and gloomy landscape, showing economic growth retarded and crippled by foreign debt burdens, balance of payment difficulties and a lack of new investment resources, a situation aggravated in many cases by natural calamities like droughts and floods.

Within this context, we have to face a fast changing world of work where the daunting challenges of international trade competition and emerging mega-trade blocks have replaced the traditional geopolitical groups of the last four decades. If we are not careful, the consequences on the social front could be catastrophic to the countries in the South. This is why I would plead for the acceleration of the process of economic growth with consequential employment opportunities and social progress.

We have often, as conditions, the need to liberalise our economies at initially greater sacrifices from the population, and in particular the working class, on prescriptions from certain international institutions. Fortunately, the conditions are becoming more digestible thanks to the recognition of our individual specificities. I recall that ten years ago when the World Bank wanted to change the structural pattern of the Mauritian economy, we pleaded for a survey to be carried out by the Bank and the ILO jointly. The result was quite a palatable solution. In other words, structural adjustment must be made in such a way as not to break the social fabric of the community.

In Mauritius we are conscious that the working world is evolving very quickly. We have tried to broaden our economic base from a monocrop culture into additional areas of manufactured products and tourism while struggling towards a South-South cooperation. But more importantly, a human resource development strategy is being evolved to ensure that the human resource base continues to be a prime asset for the long-term development of the country. The next stage of our economic development will meet with success only if our training objective takes care of future skill needs and equips the workers to deal with new technologies and cope with new levels of responsibility in order to make enterprises move upmarket and remain competitive. My Government therefore views human resource development as an important issue of considerable contemporary relevance as it presents the possibilities of occupational advancement, optimisation of means of production and provides new employment and income-earning opportunities.

The item before us on adjustment and human resources development highlights the social dimension of structural adjustment policies and underlines a need for education and training as prerequisites for economic development. Our Master Plan on Education, prepared with the financial and expert assistance of the UNDP, UNESCO, the ILO and the World Bank, is designed essentially to provide the appropriate linkage between secondary schools and the world of work. It also aims at providing the framework to enhance the skill requirements and levels of the labour force, and to make technical and vocational education a credible component for training and employment.

As industries continue to increase and expand, the need to address the prevention of industrial disasters cannot be more opportune. The tragic disasters that took place recently remind us of the necessity of taking the right initiatives at the international level in order to minimise the dangers that threaten humanity. International support is needed for creating the appropriate level of awareness and implementing training programmes in key areas. Major hazards control at industrial sites is imperative for the protection of workers, the public and the environment.

The inclusion of an item on the prevention of industrial disasters on the agenda of this Conference correctly illustrates the importance attached by the world community to this problem and highlights the necessity of multilateral arrangements for remedial action and burden-sharing. In spite of a rich legacy of labour instruments in favour of a risk-free working environment, the ILO still strives to create the structural and institutional conditions which will promote a healthy climate for economic employment growth. The discussion on the prevention of industrial disasters coincides with the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development starting in Rio de Janeiro, where my country will be strongly represented for we believe that the need to maintain sustainable development in harmony with nature must continue to dominate worldwide attention. Environmental degradation transcends national boundaries and the responsibility for finding a solution has to be shared both by developing and industrialised countries.

It is not surprising therefore that high on my strategic agenda is the implementation of social action plans for improving the safety and health and welfare of workers, supported with programmes of technical co-operation. Our challenge is to match economic performance with prior achievements affecting the working conditions of those who make that performance possible.

Another burning issue to which we have to devote our attention is the insolvency of enterprises. Loss of work is a human tragedy which we must try to avoid. But in the context of an open economy to which we have all moved, economic viability inevitably follows the logic of the survival of the fittest. The closing down of inefficient enterprises is but inevitable and, sometimes, has cruel consequences.

Fortunately, in my country we have managed to reach the situation where anybody losing his job can almost immediately find alternative employment. This, perhaps, is the prime factor at which we should aim.

The complexity of the socio-economic situation confronting us all must lead us to define a new strategy for the survival of our peoples. Gone are the days, I think, when governments could link the development of their countries with ideologies. Instead, we must try to fight for the cost benefit of every project, every action. Then, and only then, can we satisfy the social needs of the population. A host of revolutionary measures must be imagined and implemented. Employers, on their side, must be encouraged to develop fully their spirit of entrepreneurship so as to maximise employment and wealth creation in an atmosphere of confidence. Finally, trade unions must first find a modern approach to their traditional role, and secondly, find other ways of helping workers, like looking after the working environment and the quality of life, even outside the workplace.

In Mauritius this is proving extremely necessary due to the changing pattern of life as a result of industrialisation. In particular, this need is felt by women in employment who already constitute one-third of the total workforce of my country.

There has been close collaboration among the three social partners involved in economic development. In spite of the odds, and in spite of outmoded but entrenched habits, we are trying, all the social partners together, to create a new integrated approach to modern methods of production and new ways of living. This is another challenge which many of us here have to face.

(The speaker continues in French.)

I would be failing to honour my bilingual country if I did not address a few words to you in French. The problems individually mentioned by us cannot be resolved by one country acting alone. We need the assistance of international bodies, and above all we need international collaboration. I recognise the extremely positive work of the ILO in the social sphere, particularly for training, workers' education and occupational safety and health in my country, and I would like here to express my gratitude to the Director-General and his heads of departments for their support in our efforts. Nevertheless, aware of his concern for the development of the Third World, I would like to express the desire that we see his activities converge towards more emphatic and aggressive action in order to bring home to all the social partners the essential need to give close attention to collaboration on the present and future standards to be adopted to assist in the development of all countries. Finally, I would address an urgent appeal to all member countries to consider the importance of bilateral, regional and international collaboration for mutual development in fraternity. We have come here from all over the world to share our experience. Let us take advantage of that fact in order to find the mechanism which will enable us to work towards common success because alone a country is doomed to languish in underdevelopment, but all together we have a better chance to work for the welfare of our peoples. The time is ripe to think, and above all to act.

The Republic of Mauritius, in all modesty, opens its heart to all its brothers and sisters on all continents and offers its services for the construction of an unbroken chain of solidarity that will unite all the peoples of our world.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MORALES (Deputy Minister of Labour and Social Security, Costa Rica) – For one who, such as I, is honoured to represent at this session of the Conference one of the most solid and famed democracies of the Americas, the Costa Rican democracy, I can but express my profound satisfaction in turning to the study of the far-reaching and in-depth reflections on democracy from the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, in his Report.

Prompted by the thoughts, comments and questions raised by the Director-General, I would now like to share with you the democratic experience of Costa Rica. The building of Costa Rica goes back to the past century. However, it was the social reforms instigated by Dr. Rafael Angél Calderón Guardía, half-a-century ago, consolidated and strengthened by the institutions of the Second Republic, which gave social content to our democratic institutions. The Labour Code was promulgated in 1943 as a key instrument of these social reforms. In this way Costa Rica established the conditions to make labour more dignified, to create greater social justice and solidarity to the social agents. The modernisation of the State and civil society which this implicated guaranteed political stability, social peace and the freedom which we enjoy today.

Throughout the process of development which began in 1950, Costa Rica experienced wide-ranging changes to its economic and institutional structure.

As regards its institutions, the Costa Rican State promoted a culture of consensus and respect of civil and democratic values. The State improved national infrastructure and promoted an institutional system which gave material shape to the main aspects of the policy of reform. The dissolution of the army consolidated the state of law and ensured for subsequent generations the free exercise of civil rights and liberties. In other words, institutional modernisation paved the way for stable democracy committed to development based on political pluralism and the improvement of the standard of living of Costa Ricans.

As regards economic modernisation, industrialisation has been the outstanding phenomenon here. The diversification of production, the expansion of the domestic market and the search for ways of ensuring Central American trade integration were some of the tangible results of the process of industrialisation. In social terms, this process has led to the emergence of an industrial working class and to a new relationship between capital and labour regulated by a system of tripartite industrial relations which made it possible to regulate social conflict by strengthening the machinery for negotiation, mediation and conciliation. The Supreme Labour Council, a tripartite body set up in 1991, is today a forum for deliberations which provides both workers and employers alike with the means to defend their interests and also enables the State to propose its priorities.

Alongside economic and institutional modernisation, Costa Rica has brought about a transformation in its civil society. This has taken the form of greater citizen participation, in expansion of civil liberties, the respect of universal suffrage and the upholding of the right to associate. The civil society has been a counterbalance to political and administrative control by the Costa Rican State and has helped create a climate of opinion in favour of social dialogue and tolerance of the opinions and practices of minorities.

ILO technical cooperation and the development of labour policy have been peaceful and based on principles and practices which are opposed to any form of discrimination or abuse of basic human rights.

The ratification of international labour standards has been consonant with these principles which have guarantee to the working population a favourable climate for the enjoyment of the right to organise the integration of production and access to programmes established by the Costa Rican State in the fields of employment and vocational training. More particularly in this sphere of vocational training, I should like to thank the ILO for its cooperation. Costa Rica has had the support of the ILO in the development, among other things of an ambitious programme for the expansion and strengthening of small businesses. Likewise, important steps have been taken to update labour legislation and to adapt it to modern times.

We believe that social policy cannot be separated from economic programmes nor can it be replaced by aid programmes to mitigate the social cost of structural adjustment. In this sense, one important lesson from our experience in Costa Rica is that the social impact of the application of structural adjustment programmes has been assimilated without jeopardising social and political stability, because we have a solid social security system which has meant that Costa Rica has one of the highest social budgets in Latin America, with social indicators similar to those of many developed countries. We have also promoted cooperative organisations which have led to economic democratisation and the creation of new forms of distribution of social wealth. Similarly, low levels of unemployment, wage protection and institutional practices of mediation and the settlement of social conflicts, as well as the respect of human rights, are, among other, key practices which have ensured the peaceful coexistence and internal stability of the Costa Rican civil and political institutions.

I would like to conclude by saying that our most important convinction is that the wonderful work of democracy is a never-ending task, because, like man whom it serves, there is always room for improvement.

Original – Arabic: Mr. KABARITI (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – I have the pleasure and the honour to extend to the President my warm congratulations on his election to the presidency of this Conference. His election bears witness to the confidence that we place in him and in his abilities. We are certain that this Conference will be crowned with success under his leadership.

May I also address my thanks and express my gratitude to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, Mr. Hansenne, and express our appreciation for the valuable report he has prepared for us, which corresponds to current trends and is fully in keeping with the future path embarked upon by societies moving towards democracy as a means of achieving independence, construction and development. While we do not seek to classify political regimes, nor to compare them, we wholeheartedly agree with the Director-General's Report concerning the movement towards democracy and the achievement of its aims. We unconditionally support these aims and we believe that the best expression of our support is the wind of democratic change making itself felt in our country, in a region facing challenges and dangers.

The Kingdom of Jordan has heightened its democracy in order to respond to these dangers and challenges with greater freedom and respect for human rights, and this is reflected in the National Charter adopted by the Jordanian people. This document sets the objectives of our national aspirations and establishes the basis of our democracy. We have chosen to respond by placing our faith in the rule of law and in enterprises to attain comprehensive development with a human face.

This is what we call the "Jordanian experience", a democratic option, and an option which recognises political pluralism as the cornerstone of democracy. Thanks to this approach, Jordan will be oriented towards a just and comprehensive peace and strong cooperation with all other peace-loving countries, as well as strong solidarity with international organisations.

We are working for the development of educational programmes that reaffirm the value of science, of work, of participation and of equality. We are working for the adoption of a new Labour Code inspired by the model of international labour standards. This Code has already been submitted to the State Council. It guarantees the independence of the trade union movement and it ensures social security and the protection of workers. There have been more and more initiatives to counter unemployment and poverty and to promote employment through the use of development and employment funds, national assistance, the establishment of cooperatives and associations and draft legislation to improve opportunities for training. Tripartism too is being strengthened, and the social partners consult one another and work together to foster development, to establish a reform programme and economic adjustment as well as the liberalisation of our markets.

His Majesty King Hussein sees the future of our country in the terms I have been outlining, with courage and wisdom. The economic and social problems besetting my country are being addressed by the international community and international organisations. Notwithstanding the interest thus demonstrated we feel there is a need for further efforts to guarantee social security and political stability, without which we cannot bring about lasting peace and successful democracy. We therefore hope that the International Labour Organisation will play an even more important role in helping us to cope with the problems of poverty and unemployment, not only through the organisation of meetings and the adoption of Conventions and Recommendations, but also through the establishment of specific projects and practical operations in the field.

Experience has shown that the aggravation of economic and social suffering can only create an atmosphere which is favourable to extremism and violence and the relegation of moderate and more tolerant forces. It thus jeopardises pluralism and democracy. It is therefore our contention that democracy and social justice are inseparable. The ILO needs to emphasise the strengthening and encouragement of social reforms as an essential prerequisite for guaranteeing the democratic process. I feel duty-bound to emphasise the need for cooperation between our organisation, the World Bank and the IMF in order to ensure that reform programmes may be carried through in a balanced and objective way, striking a fair balance among the social, political and economic aspects. Otherwise, all efforts will be in vain and we shall not succeed in our aims.

The delegation of my country trusts that the International Labour Organisation and all its leaders will pay close attention to the problem of repatriated workers in Jordan – workers repatriated following the Gulf crisis. We hope that this problem will be resolved in accordance with international charters and by drawing up plans and programmes to mitigate the effects of this tragedy. I have no doubt that you are aware of the scale of the problem, of the dreadful suffering caused to hundreds of thousands of repatriated workers. This problem is undermining my country's efforts to reintegrate all of these repatriated persons and to satisfy their needs.

Despite the worsening unemployment in Jordan, we are trying to find jobs for over 200,000 workers from neighbouring countries, most of whom are in an irregular situation. We are providing the best possible working conditions for them, thanks to our democratic institutions and the advantages of our country, the labour protection and social security laws as well as our policy of openness and freedom of movement. I would like to take this opportunity of thanking all our brother and friendly countries that have received some 200,000 Jordanian workers on their territory.

We also hope that the ILO will work for the establishment of a regional informational system which will list all workers in order to guarantee the freedom of movement, protect their rights, and also the free movement of capital, and employers in accordance with international laws and Conventions.

We entirely agree with the Director-General when he says that race, religion, nationality and the anger of the people are pretexts used to reject other people and deny then their rights; discrimination in the field of employment remuneration and residence, and a resurgence of inhumane practices are contrary to all international labour criteria and standards, as well as ILO resolutions. It is necessary to put an end to such actions which are contrary to democracy and human rights – something to which we all aspire – a new world where peace and justice will prevail, where development and prosperity will be the rule. But this will not be possible so long as there is a gulf between international justice and international legality. Unless that gulf is bridged, the situation will continue as it is and double standards will be applied.

We have no doubt, notwithstanding these difficulties, that in Jordan society's move towards democracy will accelerate and will become the means for us to achieve development and prosperity; democracy will become an irreversible option. We are quite sure that the ILO has a decisive role to play here.

We would like to take this opportunity of thanking the Organisation – its Director-General and all his colleagues – and to express our appreciation for the constant efforts made in order to improve conditions for workers.

We would also like to thank the ILO for its close cooperation with the Arab Labour Organisation which is also working to improve conditions in the Arab world.

Finally, I would like to welcome all the new member States of the ILO. Let us hope that the work of our Conference will be a great success.

Mr. NAGANO (Employers' delegate, Japan) It is an honour to attend this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to have a chance to listen to the opinions of persons from different countries on the issues raised in the Director-General's report concerning the future role of the ILO. As the representative of Japanese employers, I would like to say a few words.

The subject of the Director-General's report is Democratisation and the ILO. The historic developments we have been witnessing over the past few years make the choice of this year's theme very timely and appropriate.

At this time it is very important to examine what is needed to promote democratisation and the ILO's role in this regard. Since economic problems and other issues resulting from the change in a socio-economic system affect people's lives directly, rapid action is needed; our discussions here will be meaningless if nothing results from them.

The founding principles of the ILO and those upon which the organisation's activities have been based are respect for fundamental human rights and the realisation of social justice, as the Declaration of Philadephia states.

Freedom, equality and economic independence are the conditions on which the independence of individuals depends. In that sense, the ILO's basic principles and activities support the achievement of democracy.

Democracy is not only a political concept but a social and economic one as well. Democracy does not merely imply the right of citizens to participate in politics, but also their possibility to lead economically independent lives based on their own efforts.

In order for citizens to be truly independent, they must be economically independent, able to find employment and earn an income. Thus, the fight against poverty and the creation of jobs are important elements underlying democracy.

In order to find jobs, people need education. Education is important not only for imparting skills needed to earn a living, but also for enabling people to make their own decisions and think for themselves. The importance of education can never be overemphasised.

I would like to say a few words about Japan's experience. It is not very long ago that Japan espoused democracy, in accordance with Allied Occupation policies after Word War II. Along with these policies, "zaibatsu" was dismantled, and the agrarian reforms were implemented, promoting the establishment of independent farming. At the same time, democratisation of labour was an important element of social development.

Various laws concerning labour were promulgated, beginning with the Labour Union Law of 1946. As soon as labour union activities were legalised, the number of union members rapidly increased and there were many serious labour disputes in this period of economic turmoil. I believe that changes in the system always entail economic and social disturbance; every country seems to undergo an upheaval when repression is eased and freedom of expression becomes possible.

Labour and management in Japan gradually learned to discuss matters thoroughly through hard experience. Especially after the first oil crisis of 1973, labour and management started to act – paying serious consideration to the overall national economy. This stance, I believe, greatly contributed to the stabilisation and growth of our economy.

Labour and management groups have thus established their own sphere of activities, particularly with regard to social and labour matters. Within this sphere, the solutions arrived at through constructive bipartite discussions have gained wide acceptance and respect in our society.

However, depending on the nature of the problems, some issues cannot be resolved only by employers and workers. The nationwide organisations of employers and workers, NIKKEIREN and RENGO, are working together to consult with the govenment to take effective measures regarding the structural policy issues.

Further, in Japan, when the government determines social or economic measure, the opinions of management and labour are reflected through a tripartite council. The Industry and Labour Council and other bodies discuss issues such as social issues at a variety of levels.

In any case, we consider that management and labour are "social partners supporting industry". The state of relations between labour and management has a decisive influence on industry and the economy.

In Japan the decision-making process concerning enterprises and even sometimes the future direction of the country through serious discussions has finally become established.

Talking about the ILO's role in democratisation, one of the ILO's basic functions is to help establish the fundamental conditions for democracy. Freedom and equality should not simply be ideas. It is important to create employment and foster companies, which provide the economic foundations for making this possible.

Through work, people live, find a means of self-expression, and contribute to society. Thus, the growth of enterprises deserves special focus – in the same way that enterprises provide workplaces, allowing people to establish economic independence.

In this connection, the ILO should take full advantage of its tripartite system to enhance awareness among workers and employers and to nurture strong, independent and responsible workers' and employers' organisations capable of acting as a stabilising force of the democratic society.

We live in an age of accelerated flow of information. Many of the drastic changes have occurred through the spread of information. With its 157 member States, and with its unique tripartite system, the ILO is in a position to collect all types of information and experiences. Because of this, the ILO should make a special effort to provide a forum for exchanges and provide information regarding democratisation. We, tripartite constituents of ILO, should make the best use of this Organisation in order to give solid backing to the current world-wide trend to democratisation.

Mr. LIM (Minister of Human Resources, Malaysia) – On behalf of the Malaysian delegation, I wish to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this Session of the Conference. We are confident that under his able leadership, this session will come to a successful conclusion. We also wish to extend to the Vice-Presidents our warmest congratulations on their election.

I would like to thank the Director-General for his Report to the Conference, especially Part I, relating to the important theme of Democratisation and the ILO. It is certainly a thoughtful analysis of one of the greatest global challenges of our age. We all subscribe to the efforts to promote democracy that would guarantee basic human rights, social protection and the sustained well-being of workers. These principles are embodied in the Declaration of Philadelphia and many Conventions and Recommendations on a wide range of subjects, including freedom of association, trade unions' rights, equalities, social protection and other labour stndards adopted at the International Labour Conference.

Almost half a century has gone by and it is time for us to review the relevance and suitability as well as the effect of those standards on member States, especially the developing countries. The truth of the situation is that nations have differing perceptions of democratisation and many developing countries are finding it difficult to keep up, let alone comply with, international labour standards, mainly because they are based on the norms and values of the developed countries which may not be compatible with the cultural values and national aspirations of the developing countries. The question may also be asked whether it is feasible to apply international labour standards on a basis of equality when there is so much disparity in economic and social development. It is this disparity which accounts for the diversity in the global application of such standards. Rigidities in these standards may suffocate economic growth and result in higher labour costs and ultimately the displacement of workers. How then can we convince workers who lose their jobs that their welfare will be taken care of by international labour standards?

We must therefore take stock of the experiences and economic difficulties faced by developing countries. We must also recognise that efforts to bring about a better quality of life and improve social conditions are part of a continuing process and can be improved only if there is sustained economic progress.

Since Malaysia's independence in 1957, the Government has devoted itself to developing the country and raising the standard of living of the people. Malaysia is unique in that it is one of the few developing countries which has within a span of two decades succeeded in bringing about socio-economic development with immense benefits to the people. This socio-economic development achieved through pragmatic and liberal economic policies and favourable labour laws has led to a relatively strike-free industrial relations climate and contributed to a near full-employment situation, higher standard of living, better quality of life and a more equitable distribution of wealth for the people. In short our development policies have been formulated bearing in mind the socio-economic realities in the country. A new National Development Policy under our Second Outline Perspective Plan for the period 1991-2000 has been formulated to replace the New Economic Policy. This policy signals a new era in our endeavour to make Malaysia a developed nation by the year 2020. The objective of the National Development Policy is to attain a balanced development of the economy in order to establish a more united and just nation. The Government's policy will be based on the principle of growth with equity, in order to achieve a fair and just distribution of wealth among all sectors of society.

As regards to our labour laws, the Government has always recognised the fundamental rights of workers to associate, and this right is guaranteed under the Malaysian Constitution. Today there are over 462 trade unions with a membership of 667,669 out of a total of about 7.1 million workers in Malaysia. Issues affecting workers' rights and labour policies are also discussed at the National Labour Advisory Council, which is tripartite in composition.

Contrary to allegations, the right of association also applies to electronics workers. In 1989, the Government amended the 1959 Trade Unions Act to facilitate the growth of enterprise unions. To date, six enterprise unions have been formed and registered in the electronics industry. In Malaysia it only takes seven workers to initiate the formation of a union, regardless of the size of the workforce. These unions are free, independent and as effective as national unions. Each has the same opportunity to develop itself into an effective and strong organisation. They are as capable as any other unions and have shown themselves able to acquire far superior benefits for their members than some of the established national unions.

The decision to amend the 1959 Trade Unions Act was taken in the context of the overall interest of national development. The interests of workers and employers must also take into account the rights of others in society at large. Governments have a responsibility to ensure that social legislation should not only guarantee economic benefits to the organised workforce, but also to the rest of society who may not be as privileged. This is also in line with the broad principles of democratisation which the ILO is promoting.

Malaysia's development will face greater challenges in the 1990s, due to its dependence not only on capital resources and technological development, but also on the quality and quantity of available human resources. The task of developing such manpower will rest upon a pragmatic educational and training system, sensitive to future changes and the needs of the market. To achieve this, the delivery system requires a more active involvement of the private sector to supplement the Government's efforts. With this in mind, the Government is in the process of establishing a Human Resource Development Fund to motivate greater private sector participation in training and skills upgrading.

It is against this background that I would like to refer to the agenda item on adjustment and human resources development. Pragmatic human resources development policies will enhance the capabilities of the workforce, thus improving income-earning ability. Such policies are also pertinent as a shortage of trained manpower can be a major constraining factor for economic development. To ensure job flexibility and security, countries also need to invest strategically in a well-educated and trained workforce, capable of absorbing existing and newly emerging technologies. Without this crucial input, a country's development may not be able to cope with the fast-changing world. Therefore it is timely that ILO places greater emphasis on human resource development, in cooperation with member States' labour ministries and agencies concerned.

Regarding the agenda item on the prevention of industrial disasters, Malaysia welcomes the proposed Convention on the prevention of industrial disasters. Recent tragedies resulting from major industrial disasters all over the world have led to the loss of many lives and incalculable damage to property and have served as grim reminders of the outcome of uncontrolled development in hazardous industries. The proposed Convention and Recommendation will provide important guidelines for member States in the formulation and periodical review of a coherent national policy for the protection of workers, the public and the environment against the risk of industrial accidents.

In line with this, our Ministry of Human Resources, is in the process of formulating specific regulations for the prevention of industrial disasters, which will incorporate most of the proposals in the Convention. The Malaysian Government has also set up an Institute of Occupational Safety and Health to train and advise both employers and workers with the view to minimising industrial accidents.

I would like to address the agenda item on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. The Malaysian Government is in the process of consultations with both employers and workers on the feasibility of introducing legislation for the setting up of a wages and benefits guarantee fund to ensure that employees are not denied their contractual and statutory benefits due to them in the event of their employers becoming insolvent.

There remains an important issue regarding the future of the ILO. There is a need for the ILO to encourage greater democratisation in terms of representations and participation of member States in the decision-making process, in order for it to keep pace with the fundamental changes in the world of work and the world economy.

In this regard, the ILO should take into account the increase in the number of new member States and the question of equitable representation in the various organs of the ILO. My main message to this august body is that it must be prepared to promote some fundamental changes if it is to be relevant to the world of work in the next century. Perhaps it is time for us to look at the ILO's organisational structure with a view to enabling developing countries to play a greater role in determining the ILO's policies and programmes. Such participation should cover areas such as policy-making, programme setting and operations, so as to ensure that the interests of developing countries which account for the majority of the ILO's membership are protected.

Let me conclude by expressing my confidence that the comprehensive agenda for this session will enable us to return to our respective countries, better equipped to deal with the various issues discussed in the various working committees. We are also ready to help the ILO to the best of our ability in discharging its many tasks in the interests of workers in general throughout the world.

President: Mr. Solórzano Martínez

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SOLÓRZANO MARTÍNEZ) – Before turning to this afternoon's agenda, I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to read a communication we have received from the Government of Turkey.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The letter is in English and I will read it in English. It is dated Geneva, 4 June 1992.

Dear Mr. President,

The Government of the Republic of Turkey took note of the declaration made on 27 April 1992 on behalf of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro, announcing the inception of the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" and asserting that the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" is the legal and political successor of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

The said declaration raises the question of representation of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia at international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation.

Under the present circumstances, Turkey cannot recognise the "Federal Republic of Yugoslavia". Turkey maintains this position at the ongoing 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would appreciate it if you could kindly present the contents of this letter to the knowledge of the Conference.

Please accept, Mr. President, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(signed) Gündüz ATKAN, Ambassador,
Permanent Representative of the Permanent Mission of Turkey in Geneva.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SOLÓRZANO MARTÍNEZ) The next item on our agenda is the continuation of the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – French: Mr. ABDI (Government delegate, Djibouti) – The delegation of Djibouti, which I have the distinguished honour of representing at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, joins all countries which have preceded it at this rostrum to present its sincere congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of this Session of the Conference as well as to all the Officers of the Conference.

Aware of their open minds, their sense of dialogue and experience in the field of social issues, I am convinced that our work this year will yield constructive and peaceful results – so desired by all countries of the Third World and former Eastern European countries.

We should also like to express our congratulations to the Director-General for his excellent Report on the role the ILO should play in the process of democratisation and the acquiring of civil liberties which is taking place now in a large number of member States in our assembly.

The points he develops in his Report illustrate the capital importance of socio-economic changes which often give rise to employment and social crises.

Thus it is imperative that all member States, especially those already developed or industrialised as well as international organisations, work together in concert to support democracy and bolster efforts undertaken by the leaders of these countries in order to lead them to a state of true democracy.

The democratisation process is a laborious and sensitive one. Our Government therefore devotes all of its energy towards this policy, together with the social, economic and political partners in Djibouti.

We would like to express our best wishes of success to the Director-General and join together with all countries and all international organisations, especially the ILO, which seek to establish true social justice in the world based on a more rational and better-balanced new economic order between the North and the South.

Our country has been most impressed by the efforts of the ILO in its development programmes and international technical cooperation activities – as seen in the excellent ILO Financial Report for the 62nd Financial Period.

As part of the restructuring measures the Director-General has proposed, the Republic of Djibouti would like to see account taken of the vital interests of Third World countries who do not have the financial means – other than international means – to have access to experts in areas of labour legislation, social security and vocational training.

The first technical item on the agenda of this 79th Session demonstrates the importance of maintaining this international technical cooperation, organised and financed by the ILO.

Both a social and legal problem, the difficulties of protecting wage claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer concern especially Third World countries where the informal, non-structured sector involves up to 50 per cent of the working population.

However, no international Convention or national legislation provides for protective measures in this informal sector, which is outside the law unlike the formal and legalised sector to which benefits from certain guarantees and measures aimed at protecting wage claims in the case of bankruptcy or insolvency of the employer.

Unfortunately, even in the latter case, we note that the protection of wage claims is far from being complete and effective.

Our country would therefore like to propose to this 79th Session of the Conference two ways in which the protection of wage claims in the case of insolvency of the employer might be improved. First, a financial guarantee system could be set up, updated by all enterprises, in agreement with and under the supervision of a joint committee involving employers and the State; this could be equal to the overall quarterly payroll. Second, wage claims could have the same rank as handwritten or superprivileged claims.

As regards the second agenda item concerning the prevention of industrial disasters, the Republic of Djibouti, although not directly affected by this problem, expresses its deep concern at the proliferation of industrial chemical companies that are constructed and used in the Third World without any special environmental protection or protection for the people living in the vicinity.

The Director-General mentions as an example the disaster in Bhopal, which impressed us all because of its magnitude and the irresponsible attitude of a number of directors.

We understand today that chemical accidents, even those resulting from a minor technical incident, may prove to be deadly and impossible to combat.

The only way to cope with this problem is prevention; our country hopes that this will be as comprehensive as possible and adopted by all countries throughout the world, because the future of all mankind is at stake.

Of course, the solutions are not simple or miraculous because there are some financial and economic imperatives which encourage the setting up of these chemical factories in the Thrird World, where legislation is not as binding as in the countries of the North. How can we hope to fight against problems of unemployment and poverty while accepting to serve as a depository of radioctive toxic wastes or allowing very dangerous factories to be set up in our countries without any special social protection?

Our delegation is counting on dialogue and the determination of each member State to ensure that an ILO Recommendation is adopted, which will contain new international standards for the prevention of industrial disasters.

Concerning the third agenda item on the adjustment and human resources development, our country has already adopted a very assertive employment and vocational training policy. For example, various official institutes and vocational training centres have been created to examine ways to draw up a realistic human resources development programme to adapt training to employment needs. This programme will be proposed to the social partners, economic leaders and educators in our country.

Furthermore, the International Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Djibouti (CICID) as well as certain enterprises, propose evening and further training courses in order to identify and meet the needs of the employment market. The only area in which very little progress has been made is that of occupational reintegration, because Djibouti does not have structures adapted to this requirement.

We would like to express the solidarity of people with our brothers in South Africa – a subject which is covered in the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the 1988 Declaration concerning action against apartheid in this great African country. Our delegation takes note of the many successful measures taken against apartheid in the field of work; an example which is really revealing is the appointment of Mr. Conrad Sidego, a renowned journalist, as Ambassador of the Republic of South Africa to Denmark. Indeed, the appointment of a man of colour bears witness to the effort made in the world of work, where the trade unions are succeeding step by step in their fight against apartheid, proclaimed by President de Klerk. We would like to express to the people and Government of South Africa our best wishes for the continuation of an inter-racial and inter-ethnic dialogue, which is both constructive and peaceful.

Last but not least, we must spare a thought for our Palestinian borthers, whose fundamental rights are still scorned to this day. May they know that we are striving for the international community to recognise fully their right to live, their right to independence and especially the justice of their cause.

In conclusion, I should like to welcome the ILO's new member States.

Mr. TROTMAN (Workers' delegate Barbados) – I should like, before I go to my prepared text, to congratulate the President on his election to his very esteemed position and to express the wish that he will continue to lead this session of the Conference in the very mature manner which he has shown so far.

I wish to congratulate the Director-General on his insightful Report on the theme of Democratisation and the ILO. I particularly agree with him where he admits that, and I quote: "unions often channelled the discontent of populations deprived of representative political parties". I venture further to add that they are the social conscience of the State even where there are political parties operating.

Whatever formal definition we may choose to give to "democracy", it is evident that central to its functioning is the need for meaningful consultation, which is based on tolerance and mutual respect. People all over the world are trying with varying degrees of success to make that consultative process work. The ILO, however, has a particularly vital role in the struggle for democracy.

We in the labour movement, while pointing out the importance of human rights as a necessary condition for the existence of democracy, have always submitted that the right of freedom of speech or of dissent or any other right is only properly protected when there is the right to organise into any association of our choosing and the right to bargain collectively.

Indeed the Director-General is very careful in presenting this very specialised ILO analysis of his theme, and he issues a very clear advisory to the social partners that if they wish for democracy then, and I quote: "The workers' organisations should be in a position to promote their members' interests vigorously. While their action will obviously be directed first and foremost to the employment-related interests of their members, it cannot be limited to this field alone. The choice of policy, especially of an economic policy, affects the life of the workers. The unions, like the employers, should therefore have a chance to express their opinions on their country's economic and social policy".

This advice of the Director-General has a particular relevance to labour in the Caribbean. At this time, we are struggling to keep our economies from total collapse. At the same time, we are satisfied that we have has a good and serious initial dialogue on how the social partners working together might bring about improved social and economic benefits for the entire community.

What seems to be one of our major setbacks is the apparent pressure which is being exerted on our Caribbean Governments to sidetrack away from the consultative approach, and to embark on policies which, at the very best, speak only to tokenism. Only a few short months ago, our Conference welcomed Mr. Camdessus, foremost spokesman for the IMF. His assurance of cooperation and his advice for the consultative process to form part of the IMF's suggestions to borrowing nations seem to be observed as infrequently as possible. Indeed, there is an almost universal view that the bureaucrats within that institution, and other international lending agencies, seem to resent any strength which they find in the labour movement. The impression is therefore that they direct governments to by-pass, or otherwise avoid union involvement, especially in this critical time when it is clear that development will only take place if it is people-centred, and if the relevant communities are given the opportunity to assist in the planning for development which is necessary.

In the Caribbean we have few or no natural resources to expedite our recovery programme. But we do have our people and we have spent much time and effort on training. This great Organisation, the ILO, has done much in the area of training, as have some other very progressive donor agencies interested in our welfare. We need now, however, to reorient our workforce, concentrating on the dynamics of the changed curcumstances. And we need, as well, to recognise the burgeoning of the informal sector and strive to devise developmental modules which will address this group.

Initial efforts which we, in Barbados, have made have suggested to me that the trade union movement and capital may be able to work more closely together. However, critical to the effort must be the awareness of the total developmental strategy of the State, and we must be in a position where we feel we can associate with and participate in that strategy. In short, we can function properly only if governments accord us the respect and the opportunity for a meaningful social dialogue which true democracy requires.

I wish to sound a note of caution however, and it is that we can make this initiative work only of we operate from the highest levels of principle. We have noted the increasing movement by the employers in our region towards the casualisation of labour. This Organisation, particularly for dockworkers, has gone a long way towards showing the general benefit for all of discontinuing ad hoc practices in labour recruitment. Regrettably this austerity period is being used by some to put back the clock. Another way in which this retrograde step is being used is by some businesses which terminate workers and then re-engage them as self-employed or private contractors to perform the same tasks.

It is my fervent wish that the ILO will use its good offices to remove this form of exploitation of labour wherever it threatens to reduce the standards set by time.

I wish to conclude by paying special tribute to our former Caribbean delegate, Sir Frank Walcott. At last year's session of the Conference, he advised that it may have been his last. Indeed, ill-health, coming on the heels of his retirement as General Secretary of the Barbados Workers' Union, has now confirmed that it was his last. I wish to record the appreciation of all my Caribbean colleagues, as well as those from further afield, for the outstanding work Sir Frank has done for labour, for freedom and for justice everywhere. On their behalf, I wish him improved health and a satisfying period of retirement.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ALBURQUERQUE (Secretary of State for Labour, Dominican Republic) – On behalf of the Government of the Dominican Republic I greet the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, congratulate him for the vote of confidence which his election represents and wish him much success in the task which member States have just conferred upon him.

Likewise on behalf of the Government of the Dominican Republice I express our gratitude to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for his wisdom in choosing democratisation as a central topic of this session of the Conference. This choice will enable the delegates to speak on the subject of a problem which concerns us all.

For the developing countries, the great challenge is to know whether the process of democratisation they are experiencing can endure or gain strength in the absence of measures which enable the population to meet their basic needs. Political democracy is inseparable from social justice. This is why freedom and the respect of human rights must be accompanied by a social and economic context in which individuals can attein their legitimate aspirations.

According to a fashionable economic school of thought, a free market will lead developing countries to prosperity and economic growth; its adherents would have the State reduce its role. But it should be asked, as the Director-General does, whether this market economy, which some proclaim as a panacea against underdevelopment, will serve the general interest or merely benefit a select minority.

This concern is well-founded, particularly for Latin American countries subjected to a policy of structural adjustment which is aimed at reducing budget deficits, stabilising the economy and enabling it to withstand the crushing weight of foreign debt. Latin America has had to endure shock therapies which, in some countries, far from helping to strengthen democracy, have imperiled it, since the measures adopted have, in a first stage, worsened poverty and, thereafter, incited the population to resist the negative effects of adjustment.

On the other hand, the neo-liberal movement led by the International Monetary Fund, by advocating a completely free market, even in the labour market, which Michel Camdessus, the Managing Director of the IMF, has said should be less rigid, has invited

Latin American employers to demand the derogation of legal norms which guarentee the social rights of workers, with the pretext that these norms hamper the creation of employment.

It is therefore significant that the Director-General states in his Report that "the law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle", and that he pleads for a "market economy with a social dimension".

Structural adjustment and the liberalisation of the economy must go hand in hand with policies to combat poverty, to protect and develop employment for the benefit of the poorest segments of the population. It bears repeating that the fragile Latin American democracies will be successful in moving towards a market economy only if their efforts are accompanied by action in the social field.

The Director-General understands, as noted in his Report, that "the strenthening of tripartism and collective bargaining" can serve to harmonise the economic transformations with the building of freer and fairer societies.

In Latin America, however, it is paternalism, dependency and excessive legalism which have characterised labour relations. This is why the transition to a market economy requires that we go beyond this worn-out scheme, and open the doors of tripartism, enabling the State, along with employers and workers, to find adequate answers to the current crisis, and keeping the process of democratisation in step with economic progress.

The Dominican Republic is a good example of how tripartism can be used to achieve social concertation policies. As a Latin American country, the Dominican Republic had to adopt structural adjustment measures which enabled it to lower inflation, to stabilise its currency and to renegotiate its foreign debt; it did so without the convulsions experienced by other countries. These adjustments were introduced gradually and with moderation, and were also accompanied by the adoption of a new Labour Code which substantially improves workers' rights. It was tripartite consultation and the consensus of the social partners which facilitated the adoption of this new Labour Code.

To implement new labour legislation which improves social rights and strengthens trade unionism while the economy is being liberalised clearly demonstrates that structural adjustment and the establishment of a market economy can be compatible with programmes of social justice and equity.

In a global economy, competition is inevitable. Tripartism can be the answer, from a social point of view, to economic adjustment policies and the introduction of a market economy. A free market must be an instrument for the prosperity of the population, and indeed it can be if it is accompanied by social programmes which favour job creation, which increase productivity, which improve the living conditions and working conditions of wage earners, which protect those who are not self-sufficient, and which establish systems of social security which make economic restructuring and industrial reconversion acceptable.

Political democracy can be consolidated and will be lasting only if States move towards a market economy in which there is equal opportunity, the satisfaction of the basic needs, the development of employment and minimum guarantees of the social rights of workers.

Deregulation and flexibility cannot overlook man or shift the weight of the crisis to the less-privileged segments of the population. A market economy can and must have a social dimension. The Dominican Republic has sought this objective by adopting a new Labour Code which recognises the esential values advocated by the International Labour Organisation, while at the same time liberalising its economy. In the end, social justice is the only sure road to peace. Without it, democracy will crumble. Let us push for democratisation; let us work towards a market economy, but let us remember that these changes will lead to lasting growth only if special attention is paid to improving the living conditions and working conditions of the population at large.

This has been understood by the State, by the employers and the workers in the Dominican Republic, and for this reason the structural adjustment policy which has managed to stabilise the economy has been accompanied by the adoption of a new Labour Code; the consensus of the social partners facilitated its passage through the National Congress and its entry into force on 29 May when it was promulgated by the Executive branch. In this way we have been able to liberalise the economy while at the same time protecting the most disadvantaged segments of the populaltion. What we have understood in the Dominican Republic is that social justice is essential for peace.

Mr. MOKZHANI (Employers' delegate, Malaysia) – First of all, on behalf of the Malaysian Employers' Federation I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the high office of President. We all look forward to his able leadership during this session. My congratulations also to the two Vice-Presidents on their well-deserved election.

We have before us the usual agenda items, a number of which are to be discussed first in the committees before deliberation at the plenary. Of the technical items, I wish to refer principally to the question of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer which is presently tabled for a second discussion. I shall not elaborate on the views expressed by Employer members last year since I fully associate myself with those views. There is no doubt in my mind that it would be better to deal with this subject in a national rather than in an international setting. In this connection, the Government of Malaysia is proposing to establish by law a Workers' Wages and Statutory Benefits Protection Fund. The proposal entails setting up a guarantee fund to which only employers will contribute.

As President of the Malaysian Employers' Federation I am happy that the minister responsible has consulted employers through the tripartite National Labour Advisory Council. We have requested, and the Government has agreed, that the matter should be further studied. While Malaysian employers wholeheartedly support the principle of workers being protected in the event of their employers becoming insolvent, we feel that the method by which such protection is to be provided requires careful study. We are of the view that each employer should be primarily responsible for the welfare of employees and it is not therefore equitable to the majority of employers who strive hard to succeed to bear the consequences of failure of others. If a workers' protection fund is to be made statutory, then it is only fair and reasonable that workers should also contribute to such a fund. There are already institutions in Malaysia to which workers and employers contribute although the beneficiaries are only the workers. Examples are the Employees' Provident Fund (EPF) and the Social Security Organisation (SOCSO).

Business are set up for profit, but even if the investors and managers do not wish it, it is a fact of life that some businesses fail for internal and external reasons. Insolvency not only adversely affects workers but it also has dire consequences for owners of capital and suppliers of credit. Even so, the Malaysian employer community takes the view that workers should be accorded priority in such situations. We have asked the Malaysian Government to work within the existing laws and mechanisms such as suitable amendments to the Companies Act, to give priority to the legitimate claims of workers in the event of the insolvency of their employers. We have requested them to refrain from creating new laws and new bureaucratic structures to cope with the problem.

I would like now to refer to the question of instruments passed by the Conference in previous years. And I shall confine my remarks to Conventions. As of now, the Conference has passed 172 Conventions. Resolving ILO instruments has been a major task of the ILO. The world has possibly become a little bit better thanks to the ratification of Conventions by member States. However, the record of ratification has been dismal indeed. I do not wish to go into the details, but it is abundantly clear that a large number of countries both developed and developing have ratified far too few of the 172 Conventions. In the Asia-Pacific region, from where I come,ratification is as low as three or four in certain countries. The country with the highest rate of ratification has not even reached one-third of the total of 172 Conventions. And so it should be legitimate to ask where the priority of ILO work should be. Is it in pushing for the passing of more and more Conventions? Should not the ILO instead be doing purposeful promotional work so that a much higher rate of ratification can be achieved? I would seriously suggest the latter. The existing Conventions already cover most of the important areas. It is better that the ILO tries to have these adopted and ratified by governments. There is not point in multiplying the number of Conventions and yet achieving no higher than the currently poor rate of ratification.

Of course, the human mind is so fertile that it will be able to suggest to the Conference more and more Conventions for adoption. There are already several recently passed Conventions which very few countries will be able to ratify, such as these on night work and the sector-specific Convention on hotels and restaurants. Matters which might be best left to national governments are now proposed to be governed by international instruments; such is the case with the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. These developments are unfortunate and should be reviewed. I would urge the Governing Body to put a standstill to more Conventions. Resources should be released to promote wider ratification of existing Conventions, and greater attention should be given to the intensification of technical assistance in member States.

On the question of technical assistance, I read with some concern in Part II of the Director-General's Report that "continuing efforts are being made to link ILO activities on standards and ILO technical cooperation". In connection with this, I would like to propose that ILO technical assistance should not be made conditional upon ratification of any Convention. The need for technical assistance in many fields, especially in less developed countries, is clear and easily identifiable. I wish that the ILO had much more financial resources than at present so that it could increase its work in this area. We already know the difficulties many countries face in ratifying a number of Conventions. If, in addition, technical cooperation is to be made conditional upon adherence to standards adopted by the Conference, as implied by the Director-General's statement I quoted, I fear that the result will be that the ILO assistance will be directed to where it is least needed.

Furthermore, on the issue of assistance, need I remind this assembly that ours is a tripartite body? I note that assistance to employers' organisations and for employers' activities in relation to that devoted to workers' organisations is disproportionately small. Let it not be assumed that all employers' organisations in ILO member countries have adequate personnel and financial resources to carry out the required activities. Allocating extra resources to strengthening the activities of employers' organisations will contribute to the strengthening of tripartism. Only an effective employers' organisation can influence each nation's employer community into adopting good employment practices. I would request the Director-General to review this matter.

Finally, I commend the Director-General for his Report Democratisation and the ILO. In doing so, I also welcome the new members who have just joined the ILO. It is true, as the Director-General says, that democracy is often associated with the liberalisation of markets. It is also true that democracy is a precondition for social justice. I wish, however, to add that it is difficult to achieve social justice if there is no continuing prosperity. In order for countries to prosper it is important to ensure the continued growth and expansion of the private sector and of private enterprise. We need to make this explicit in the policy of the ILO. I welcome the Director-General's suggestion that the Office should make a determined effort to develop a policy of active partnership with the constituents of the Organisation, i.e. not only with government organisations but also with employers' and workers' organisations so as to involve them more closely in ILO activities.

I also share the view given in the Report that the ILO should make every effort to support democracy and in that connection promote the application of international standards relating to the rights of workers, but I would like to say that in doing so we must not let free enterprise, private initiative and entrepreneurship suffer because to do so would be tantamount to killing the goose which lays the golden eggs necessary for improving the standard of living in all countries.

Original – Russian: Mr. EFIMENKO (Workers' delegate, Ukraine) – I would like first of all to congratulate the President on his election to this lofty post and I would like to wish this Conference every success.

On the agenda for this session, there is a very important and topical question. Democracy is the milk upon which a new generation will feed. The peaceful revolutions which spread acress central and eastern Europe have shown convincingly that people are not content to see their own private initiatives crushed and democracy sacrificed to State diktats. Democracy must become the basis for social and cultural transformation in Europe and in the world at large.

Having moved away from the totalitarian system, the people of Ukraine have begun to create a democratic society. The transition from totalitarianism to democracy, from a centralised to a market economy is a difficult process. The power of money in society, hitherto restricted by the administration, has seeped into every aspect of social relations. Commercialisation and wealth are increasingly seen as the ultimate goal. It is suggested that the more wealthy people are, the better it is for society as a whole. However, at the same time specialists estimate that over two-thirds of the populaltion in the Republic are living below the poverty line. The Council of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Ukraine have worked out a programme to defend the social interests of workers during the transition to a market economy, which embraces the population as a whole and relies on the participation of governments, workers and employers. We need, first and foremost, a scientifically determined minimum consumer budget and, allied with this, a minimum wage, pensions, grants, and social benefits. Secondly, we need to protect the purchasing power of the population by indexing wages. We need a proper social security system and benefits for families with children, pensioners, students, young people and other sectors of the population. And, last but not least, we must protect the consumer market and consumers' rights.

Bearing in mind that the present economic situation in Ukraine does not make it possible to ensure a minimum wage above the minimum standard of living, even though this is provided for in legislation, the trade unions have worked out an alternative governmental concept of wage reform. It envisages a gradual approximation of minimum wages to the minimum consumer budget, a gradual increase in wages to reflect the real value of the labour force. A socially acceptable level of protection for the population in 1992 must ensure that minimum wages and pensions are at the same level on physiological consumption.

All of this shows that Ukraine today ranks among those countries which are not going to be able to overcome their economic difficulties alone, without assistance from the international community in the area of social policy.

We share the views expressed by the Director-General of the ILO that "the ILO's mandate and its experience in the field make it the ideal agency to assume responsibility for developing a system of social protection tailored to the needs and resources of its members".

One of the most important tasks of Ukrainian trade unions is to ensure full and rational employment. This participation in working out employment policy, and monitoring observance of employment legislation, which is covered by corresponding Ukrainian laws, is essential. On the initiative of the Council of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Ukraine and the Ministry of Labour of Ukraine, an employment service has been established, with finance coming mainly from the State budget. A tripartite coordination committee has been set up to harmonise the activities of trade unions, administrative bodies and employers' organisations.

The main aim of the trade unions is to prevent spiralling unemployment. This is not a corporatist alternative. Quite the contrary, the activity of trade unions is directed at defending the interests of the weakest sectors of the population – young persons, women, the disabled and the sick.

Bearing in mind the increase in unemployment due to structural changes, the problem of retraining the population has intensified. However, the Ukraine itself is not able to set up, overnight, a new system of vocational training and retraining for management personnel. We simply cannot keep up with all the changes that are taking place in connection with the transition to a market economy and in particular, the changes in the structure of labour. The Ukraine must diligently adhere to ILO programmes on employment and development, and training. This does not mean that we are going to become a burden on the ILO but the present situation simply does not allow us to confine ourselves merely to consultations. We need to experiment, with the held of the ILO, which can help us to stabilise employment in this transitional period.

Today the trade union movement in Ukraine is also facing considerable difficulties. The traditional trade union structure has shown itself to be inflexible and unable to meet the challenge of a market economy. The trade unions do not have a real mandate to take decisions in the area of social policy, due to a lack of legal provisions covering their activity.

Due to the fact that the process of forming employers' organisations is not yet completed, we have not, so far, embarked upon social dialogue with employers at the national level.

However, we have taken the initiative with regard to negotiations with the Ukrainian Union of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs, and this is not merely to provide us with an alibi so that we are not accused of being unwilling to take advantage of the tripartite system to strengthen democracy. Agreement with this Union, should, we believe, help form an overall legal framework for regulating industrial relations in Ukraine.

In November this year, we are going to hold an extraordinary congress of the Council of the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Ukraine. Far-reaching structural, strategical and tactical changes are being prepared, but in order to carry them out we need help, in the form of information on trade union centres abroad. We also need consultations with experts, access to information exchanges and other data banks, training and internships abroad for our trade union leaders and experts, etc. We ourselves are ready fully to cooperate with trade unions of all countries and at every level.

In conclusion, I would like to express our hope that the ILO will be successful in carrying out its activities which are aimed at ensuring social justice – the prerequisite for lasting peace throughout the world.

Original – Russian: Mr. KLOCHKOV – Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this very responsible and honourable post. I am certain that under his leadership the Conference's work will be a success.

It is for me a source of great satisfaction to be able to take part in the discussion of such a timely and crucial question as the role of the ILO in the current process of democratisation. Indeed, this process has, in one way or another, affected practically all the countries of the world, without exception. As the report quite rightly points out, it is sometimes met with violations of human rights or attempts to limit trade union activities or curtail the social gains of workers. In our country, as there has been an explosion of political liberties, the democratisation of public life has assumed a critical and sometimes unmanageable nature and has approached the brink of the dangers so aptly alluded to in the Director-General's Report.

To be honest, we must recognise that along with the positive changes brought about by democratisation throughout our society, we have also encountered serious difficulties stemming from the distortion of the country's economic development, acute social problems and inter-ethnic conflicts.

Society's political democratisation must inevitably be accompanied by democratisation of an economic type – otherwise, people will have a warped idea of democracy as a concept legitimising social and legal inequality.

Since its inception, the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Russia and its associated sectoral trade unions and regional associations have on many occasions demonstrated their commitment to the strategic course of the reform policy. The reform policy aims to renew Russian society based on free market relations.

Notwithstanding our support for the reforms, we have always advocated what the Director-General's Report correctly refers to as "a market economy with a human face".

It is our firm conviction that the transition to a market economy must take place providing workers not only with the freedom to dispose of their work as they choose, but also with certain social guarantees, ensuring social protection and social justice. The trade unions' stance on this matter is not always in agreement with the authorities' action in implementing the reforms. Our positions clash on a number of questions. This is normal practice for such relations. What matters is the way in which such conflicts are resolved: through negotiations or through strikes. We are in favour of negotiations, reasonable consensus, social partnership and social peace, and we are opposed to the unleashing of tensions and the aggravation of the vicious cycle which could definitively ruin an already weakened economy.

However, we have the right to count on a certain amount of respect for trade unions' positions. We therefore support the Report's statement that the "law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle". It is impossible to obtain effective results in the transitional phase we are now going through without a constructive dialogue between the Government and the social partners and without involving all layers of society in the solution of national problems.

When it is impossible to reach agreement, certain workers' groups, through their trade unions, will as a last resort make use of strikes.

In May a nearly month-long nationwide strike of over 3 million physicians and teachers came to an end. They had presented claims which were fair and which were met when a compromise was reached. At present there are difficult negotiations being held with the Automotive Transport Workers' Union, which has postponed a nationwide protest action.

There has been a strong wave of protest in many sectors and regions because of the non-payment of wages. Technical difficulties cannot be used to justify problems of this type.

From the people's point of view, such problems are a direct violation of their human rights. And they are ready to defend these rights.

In recent months, there has been a paradoxical payment crisis brought about by the indebtedness of the social partners to each other and by the breakdown of economic ties. This breakdown has led production to plummet and has even shut down some enterprises. This has occurred not simply, as a result of restructuring and the bankruptcy of the weaker, less profitable establishments, which would have been an inevitable and necessary, albeit painful, part of the overall process. It is, unfortunately, becoming an overall phenomenon to see enterprises closed as a result of serious miscalculations in economic management.

The trade unions of Russia, Belarus and Ukraine jointly have appealed to the presidents and heads of government of their countries to immediately commence negotiations to avoid the most serious consequences, to stabilise interstate productive and financial activities and to sustain employment and the payment of salaries.

What, at this stage, is the main concern of the trade union I represent?

The economy is continuing to collapse, and ever greater segments of the population are being impoverished and transformed into a lumpenproletariat, facing mass unemployment and the limitation of social guarantees. Is it really unavoidable that such people should suffer?

I should like to refer to some statistical data. Despite the fact that most of the population spends the greater part of its income on food, the daily calory intake ration has dropped to 2,100 calories. The type of food eaten has been concentrated more on carbohydrates, with fewer protein sources. The number of diseases related to nutritional deficiencies among infants under one year old has increased.

For the first time since the Second World War, the mortality rate has exceeded the birth rate. The recently begun dismantlement of free state health care, services, education and social services is taking place significantly faster than the new social protection system can be set up.

Such developments have led to worker dissatisfaction and social tensions, naturally leading trade unions to be concerned about the future direction of economic restructuring and democratisation. In this regard we can only agree with the statement in the Director-General's report to the effect that "No political regime and no economic system can expect to endure unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of its population."

It is the opinion of the trade unions that the reform programme requires serious corrections. We cannot further pin our hopes on financial stabilisation at the macroeconomic level or the observance of the general recommendations of the International Monetary Fund. Such recommendations are far from effective for the specific case of a highly monopolised and militarised non-market economy. We advocate giving priority to a set of institutional transformations, beginning with: the creation of a labour market; the reduction of monopolistic powers; the modification of the manner in which state property is managed; the development of bankruptcy procedures; privatisation, taking into account the interests of the workers; and the conversion of military production.

The production and payment crisis must be solved immediately through a well-targeted structural and industrial government policy. It should aim to stimulate competitive production of goods required by the population. Incentives should include tax breaks and credit privileges.

In order to carry out a civilised transition to the market, to develop democracy and economic relations with a minimum of conflict and to establish a basis for social dialogue, we require now more than ever the assistance of the international community. We need to make use of the experience of tripartism and the experiences of the trade unions in countries with market economies.

In this regard we fully support the three basic thrusts of the ILO's practical activities. We have expectations for their concrete results.

The trade unions of Russia are counting on the ILO's assistance firstly in the field of workers' education. The ILO's experience in this field can make an invaluable contribution in our world to involve workers actively in market relations. We have already begun working together. Our contacts with ILO experts on the training of supervisory personnel and the organisation with their help of seminars are noteworthy contributions to the implementation of our programme and we are counting on the continuation of such cooperation in the future.

We would like to come to a new understanding of the collective bargaining system and would like actively to participate in solving employment problems and other social problems by working in the ILO's sectoral committees. We hope that the ILO will not only create large-scale programmes, but will also take a leading role in the organisation of bilateral and multilateral exchanges of experience with our partners from countries with market economies.

For our part, we are eager to cooperate with the ILO in a constructive manner to solve problems of general concern.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABBADI (Minister of Employment, Morocco) – I am very pleased to associate myself with the Ministers and heads of delegations who preceded me at this rostrum in congratulating the President on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the Kingdom of Morocco upon his election to the Chair of the 79th Session of the Conference.

We are convinced that with his skill and thorough knowledge of the issues and objectives of our Organisation, our work shall yield the expected results.

I avail myself of this opportunity to thank the Director-General for the efforts he continues to deploy in order to achieve the noble objectives assigned to our Organisation. I should also like to welcome the new member States who will without doubt contribute to the action undertaken by our Organisation.

The process of democratisation has been chosen this year by the Director-General as the subject of our debate, which confirms that our Organisation is very attentive to changes in the world. These changes are characterised by the adoption of a pluralist system and by the choice of a liberal economic system as a means of economic and social development.

The proposals and ideas contained in this report are such as will strengthen the action of our Organisation in assisting the countries concerned to establish the bases of democracy through dialogue, the strengthening of labour relations and by the improvement of production.

We thus agree with the Director-General that it is not incumbent on the ILO to deal with political issues. Nevertheless, its mandate obliges it to fight against discrimination in all its forms and to pomote equal opportunity and treatment, particularly as regards employment and occupation.

We also believe that democracy can develop only if all national potential is associated with the management of a country's public affairs, so that economic social and cultural progress can be achieved in an atmosphere of social justice and democracy.

To this end, the ILO is called upon to step up its efforts and pursue its action in the field of technical cooperation in order to assist member States in the promotion of employment, the fight against unemployment, the strengthening of the protection of workers and the improvement of working conditions and the working environment.

The Kingdom of Morocco, under the enlightened leadership of His Majesty King Hassan II, has opted for a liberal economic policy, and has chosen trade union pluralism and political parties in order to achieve its economic and social development.

Political and trade union pluralism is an essential characteristic of the authentic nature of the Moroccan people. Since the beginning of independence, our country has enshrined this democratic choice by prohibiting a single-party system and by providing for the plurality of political, trade union and professional organisations, and by guaranteeing to all citizens the freedom of membership in any political and trade union organisation of their choice.

Our country, convinced of the importance of dialogue and of concerted efforts in all spheres and at all levels, has reserved an important role for employers' and workers' occupational organisations which are represented in the Parliament and in national advisory councils, such as the Higher Council for National Promotion and Planning, the Advisory Council on Human Rights, the National Council for Youth and the Future, all of which actively participate in the drawing up of all economic and social development plans. The occupational organisations are also represented on such social bodies as the Office of Vocational Training an Employment Promotion, the National Social Security Fund, the mutual societies and the national and provincial committees on vocational training and employment.

The Government of the Kingdom of Morocco encourages dialogue with all economic and social partners. This dialogue is a permanent one at all levels and within all sectors; its essential objective is the drawing up of a national social pact to determine the rights and duties of all parties. This social pact will contribute to the establishment of social peace to the benefit of workers and the community and help increase the production and development of the national economy.

The agenda of the present session includes issues of great importance, including the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters and adjustment and human resources development.

As to the first point, I already expressed the view of my country at the preceding session on this matter. Yet, I would like to point out at this time that the recommendations adopted within the framework of dialogue with the social partners include the carrying out of a study on the creation of a wage guarantee fund in the event of insolvency of the employer or of the closing down of the enterprise.

As to the second point, the prevention of industrial disasters, the Kingdom of Morocco feel that it is time to prepare instruments in this sphere, particularly since industrial progress and technological change today are in most cases the main causes of industrial disasters whose consequences are nefarious for both mankind and our natural resources.

We hope that this session of the Conference will result in the preparation of a Convention and a Recommendation containing preventive measures which guarantee man's safety and the preservation and the protection of the environment.

As regards the third item, adjustment and human resources development, I would like to point out that this matter is of great importance, especially at a time when many countries are experiencing changes in their economic and social structures as a result of adjustment policies.

In this context, and alongside the policy of structural adjustment followed in recent years and which has positive economic effects, the Kingdom of Morocco continues to support the social sectors and in particular, education, teaching, training, employment, health and social affairs. We have continued to support these sectors and the role assigned to then in the various economic and social development plans illustrate the importance which the Government attributes to social matters.

The discussion on the process of democratisation and social justice should not let us forget the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and in the other Arab occupied territories.

I hope that this matter will be broadly discussed at the special sitting which will be organised by our Conference on this subject.

Before concluding, I should like to reiterate my thanks to the Director-General of the ILO, his collaborators and his staff, and I would like to express gratitude for the work carried our and the positive results that have been achieved. I should also like to wish you all every success in your task.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself it is a great privilege to associate myself with the other distinguished speakers in offering sincere felicitations to the President and Vice-Presidents, including my friend Mr. Mugalla, the Workers' Vice-President.

May I also take this opportunity to convey fraternal greetings from the working class of Pakistan and myself to all the esteemed participants, in particular the members of the Workers' group who have conferred honour upon me by electing me as one of the officers of the Workers' group.

We appreciate the work of the members of the Governing Body, headed by Mr. Chotard and Mr. Oechslin, Vice-Chairman, and particularly of the Workers' group led by Mrs. Shirley Carr, Spokeswoman, and Mr. Laurijsson, Secretary of the Workers' group.

We welcome the admission of the States of Kyrgyzstan, Azerbaijan, the Republic of Korea, Latvia, Estonia, Albania and Viet Nam.

We pay tribute to the work of Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General, with his dedicated team, in carrying out the mandate of the ILO, despite constraint of the resources.

The Director-General has presented a comprehensive Report on an important subject, entitled Democratisation and the ILO, and has rightly concluded that "Democracy is not just for the rich, its values are universal: from north to south from east to west every human being aspires to freedom and justice (...) with social justice democracy is the sole guarantee of peace in the world". He has declared that major ILO technical and regional programmes would focus on the war against poverty and on employment provision, improvement of conditions of employment and of the working environment, and on the health and safety of workers, including the well-being of women, and on war against the evil that is child labour. He further declared the ILO would continue to pursue universal and lasting peace based upon social justice. He has outlined the various measures being undertaken in respect of fundamental human rights, as well as the protection of workers, in the process of structural adjustment. He has spoken of human resources development, of the importance of the rural sector, of strengthening institutions such as trade unions and employers' organisations, and of collective bargaining and tripartism.

The noble objectives of the ILO, are outlined in its Constitution (proclaimed in 1919) which requires the elimination of injustice and hardship to workers, and the protection of children, young persons and women and of workers employed in other than their own countries, and also in the Declaration of Philadelphia which reaffirms the fundamental principle that labour is not a commodity and that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere, and that freedom of expression and of association are essential to sustained progress. Bearing these objectives in mind it is painful to point out that despite the passage of 73 years since the founding of the ILO, we still have a world wherein almost 1.3 billion of the population lack even access to healthy water supplies and 2.3 billion have no sanitation facilities; 32 million children died last year from water-borne diseases; there are more than 1,600 million people without health services; 1,250 million people live below the poverty line mostly in the rural sector; the literacy rate in the least developed countries is only 37 per cent; 1 billion people are illiterate, nearly 600 million of them women; the number of unemployed is rising at the rate of 35 million every year, which is already at 700 million.

In order to promote the principle of democracy and social justice, it is the need of the hour that each child should have access to meaningful education and training, not only to play its positive role in the development of a better future for mankind, but also to break the chains of ignorance imposed upon the bulk of the children of the Third World, due to the poverty of their parents since their birth. Each young person should have an opportunity of gainful employment with healthy working and living conditions both in the urban and rural sectors, with the guarantee of a suitable minimum wage and social security benefits. There should be an improvement in the quality of life for womenfolk and the rural poor, most of whom in Third World countries still suffer from a lack of the basic necessities of life. Four-fifths of the world's population living in Asia, Africa and Latin America receive only 13.3 per cent of the total world income, while 20 per cent of the poorest receive only 1.4 per cent and a 1 per cent share of global trade.

In such a situation, we have a world of haves and have nots; 25 per cent of the world's population consumes 70 per cent of the energy of the planet, while US$900 billion are being spent on military spending each year. The level of human resources development in the South in terms of engineers and scientists is only 100 per million, while the North has 40,000 per million persons. Even this meagre percentage is prone to a brain drain to the West. The Third World is continuously subjected to an unjust international economic order which makes the poor poorer by a high foreign debt burden, unjust terms of international trade by lowering the price of their commodities. The price of 33 commodities, excluding oil, in 1988 was 33 per cent lower in real terms than in 1979-81. By contrast, in recent years, developing countries have had to make a net debt-related transfer of nearly US$40 billion per year to the developed counties, having no hope of a reversal of the flow of capital from the poor to the rich.

Between 1983 and 1987 alone, net IMF transfers turned from +US$7.6 billion to –US$7.9 billion, while World Bank transfers also turned negative to –US$500 million in 1991.

This being the situation, it is the duty of the rich nations to fulfil their human obligation to help Third World countries with their foreign debt burden, to give them a fair return on their commodities, to open avenues for their exports against protectionism, to fight against the spread of pollution by providing common programmes of action, to transfer technology and scientific know-how in order to combat poverty, hunger and ignorance thereby promoting democracy based upon social justice.

It is also equally the duty of the leaders of the Third World countries to radically change their social and economic order so as not to allow the rich to get richer and the poor to get poorer, and to enable human beings to develop their full potential, build self-confidence through meaningful mass education and training programmes, and lead their lives with dignity and fulfilment, freeing them from the fear of want and exploitation through a joint struggle for their common objective in conformity with ILO standards of freedom of association and the development of organisations, such as trade unions and rural workers' organisations, and the dismantling of the feudalistic system, thereby giving the rural poor access to land and know-how.

In this context, the workers' organisations rightly expect the ILO to assist their efforts in workers' education and institutional development to achieve the objective of democracy, in line with the norms of social justice, and to raise adequate resources for workers' education.

There is also a need for running public administrations in Third World countries with greater transparency and accountability; public leaders should set an example through integrity, efficiency, dedication and austerity.

The growing population also requires that priority be given to mass education and public awareness of the need for population control.

The workers' organisations in Pakistan have been pressing the Government to bring the remaining labour legislation into conformity with ILO Conventions, including the restoration of trade union rights in radio and television, and to apply all labour welfare laws to all employees, regardless of their emoluments, to improve health and safety at the workplace, to raise the minimum wage to keep pace with the high cost of living, to improve the lot of rural workers and women folk and children, to tackle the problem of growing unemployment among youth, and to check the rising inflation in the country. The Government promised new legislation in the last tripartite standing body meeting, at which time the workers' group made their main points known to the Government; we have been awaiting the results eagerly. And we have been demanding early positive measures for the economic and social well-being in those areas.

The Government of Pakistan has pased progressive labour legislation concerning the welfare of children, namely the Employment of Children Act, as has instituted severe sanctions for forced labour, in conformity with the national Constitution and ILO Conventions Nos. 105 and 29, which it seeks to implement in letter and spirit by providing economic and social measures to combat this evil.

The Government has concluded an agreement with the trade unions of state-owned enterprises ensuring job security and other special benefits in the process of privatisation. However, the trade unions have been urging the Government to ensure that the State should continue to perform its role as regards the provision of basic neds in the areas of health, education, electricity and communications, since the poor segments of society cannot pay the high prices for basic utilities and needs fixed by private enterprise.

We hope that the ILO will continue to extend its cooperation to trade unions in the process of structural adjustment, to mitigate its adverse effects and to provide social safety nets by enlarging workers' education and training programmes and developing research and study activities.

May I also take the opportunity to convey our appreciation of the work of the ILO in various fields, including workers' education, improving working conditions, employment, human resources development, industrial relations, migration, international labour standards, the International Institute of Labour Studies, the fight against child labour, as well as the contribution of the Workers' Relations Branch, led by Mr. John Svenningsen, and his dedicated team. We also appreciate the close cooperation of the Asian Regional Office and the Area Office in Islamabad, Mr. Nakamura, Assistant Director-General, and Mr. Dudley, in the promotion of workers' activities.

May we also place on record our deep appreciation of the work performed by two dedicated ILO officials who are retiring, namely Mr. George Kliesch and Mr. Sidibé, who headed PIACT and the International Labour Standards Department, respectively, with great devotion. As well, we appreciate the dedicated work of Mr. Cesare Poloni, Chief of the Workers' Education Branch, during his 27 years' service, who is to retire at the end of this year.

The working class of Pakistan fully supports the just struggle of the South African people against the racist regime of apartheid, which is a crime against mankind, and hopes that they will achieve their independence.

We fully support the right to independence of the people of Palestine in the occupied Arab lands, in accordance with the United Nations resolution, and welcome the Report of the Director-General concerning these struggling people.

We also welcome the establishment of a representative interim governments in our fraternal neighbouring nation, Afghanistan, and wish them success and prosperity in new areas.

The working class of Pakistan is looking forward to the Director-General's visit; along with other tripartite partners, namely the Government of Pakistan and employers' organisations, we will be glad to welcome him to the land of Pakistan.

We are sure that the deliberations of this historic session of the Conference will form a milestone for working men and women in the improvement of their working and living conditions; that it will enhance the dignity of work, and promote the objectives of social justice in order to develop a better future for mankind as a whole.

Mr. TAMRAKAR (Minister of State for Labour and Industry, Nepal) – It is a great honour and privilege for me to address this august gathering. I would first like to extend warm congratulations to the President, Vice-Presidents and other officers of this Conference on behalf of my delegation, and on my own behalf, on their well-deserved election. I am confident that under their wise and able guidance this Conference will undoubtedly achieve its objectives.

During the past two years important developments have taken place in Nepal. A popularly elected government is in office. A new Constitution has been adopted which guarantees all human rights, including the right of freedom of association, civil liberties and protection against exploitation. Laws are being enacted to give practical effect to such constitutional provisions.

In the labour field the Government is committed to promote and protect the rights and well-being of the workers. Substantial reforms are already under way to achieve this objective. The old Act of 1959 has been replaced by a new law, the Labour Act, 1992, which extends to different, so far unprotected, sectors, as well as with special provisions for women and young workers. It provides for better conditions of work, updates health and safety standards and enhances social security benefits. Procedures on labour-management relations have been streamlined. A law on voluntary registration and recognition of trade unions is on the anvil and is expected to be adopted in the next session of Parliament. These laws fully recognise the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining and should pave the way for industrial peace in the country, which is one of the main objectives of the country's labour policy. The Bonus Act, 1974, which provides for the participation of workers in the profits of a company, and the Foreign Employment Act, 1985, are also being amended to suit the present day needs of the country. For the first time, provision has been made in the Labour Act for a Labour Court in the country.

Nepal is a least developed country and is confronted with many problems, not only on the economic front, but also in the social field. Child development is one such problem. Our population is growing at the rate of 2.1 per cent per annum and is now estimated at 18.4 million, with children under the age of 18 accounting for 52 per cent of the population. Their welfare and development is a major concern of the Government. A ten-year National programme of Action for Children and Development has been formulated and put into action. A law which provides for the rights of children has been enacted. Nepal has already ratified the Conventions on children's rights.

Participation of women in the economic development process is another important matter which is being given priority. Government, as well as non-government agencies, are involved in this task.

Nepal is now in the process of entering into the Eighth Development Plan (1992-97). The guiding principles of the Plan have already been determined. It will be our earnest endeavour to assure a minimum standard of living for the poor. Poverty alleviation is a principal objective of this Plan and is the commitment of the present Government.

A prerequisite for poverty alleviation is growth in employment. Unfortunately, due to the high rate of population growth, the unemployment situation in Nepal has become more acute. While open unemployment estimated at 6 per cent is not that high, it is underemployment which is worrying us more. Nearly 90 per cent of employment is in the agricultural sector with no further scope to absorb additional labour. This means that most of the existing unemployed, together with the estimated annual growth of 200,000 economically active persons, will have to be absorbed in the non-agricultural sector. Various measures have been adopted to cope with this situation which include, inter alia, extension of public works and social services to rural areas, access to credit and other support measures to encourage self-employment, promotion of cottage industries, promotion of tourism and energy development and its extension to rural areas.

After the establishment of a democratically elected Government, we expect industrialisation to lead to the overall economic development of the country. A liberal private-sector-oriented investment policy has been adopted. Foreign investors can own 100 per cent equity in medium and large-scale industries. Licensing requirements have been relaxed. Repatriation of profits, dividends and receipts from the sale of property have been liberalised. Guidelines for the privatisation of public enterprises are being drawn up with the assistance of the World Bank. Needless to mention that the ILO is also participating in this exercise.

In the process of industrialisation, environmental protection should not be ignored. However, this immense task cannot be handled by developing nations alone. International agencies should seek support from developed countries and help the developing countries, particularly the least developed ones.

However, a significant limitation to the growth of the industrial sector is that a major portion of the existing workforce is unskilled. There is an urgent need to supplement agricultural activities by providing skill training in non-farm activities. Our Government is committed to expanding and improving training opportunities, especially in the rural areas. A comprehensive labour market information system is being developed. While the ILO is already assisting us in this task, there is a need to further step up its technical assistance programme to meet our urgent needs, particularly in the field of vocational training. I would like to reiterate the need for the ILO Area Office in Nepal, which has become a necessity in view of the size of the ILO technical assistance programme in the country. I hope that our request will receive a favourable response from the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General is devoted to an important and topical subject, the role of the ILO in the process of democratisation. We are looking forward to a constructive debate in the Conference on this innovative topic. Although Nepal is still in the infancy stage of democracy, we are committed to promoting democratic values in labour as well as in all other fields. Tripartism is the basis of our new labour policy. The ILO can play an important role for the promotion of tripartism at the national level through its technical cooperation programme. The equilibrium between the demands of workers and the capacity of management should be maintained for the stability and development of the country.

In view of the interdependence of labour markets and the need for greater cooperation between countries, there is urgent need for a solution to the problems of migrant workers. Special measures should be taken for the promotion and protection of the rights of migrant workers.

With reference to the various topics of the agenda, we shall welcome international standards on these issues. Workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employers need to be protected. Guidelines from the International Labour Conference should help member states to enact suitable legislation on this subject. Regarding the prevention of industrial disasters, there is a need for suitable regional arrangements because it may not be possible for individual countries to evolve elaborate control systems. Suitable training programmes at regional and national levels should also be arranged by the ILO.

It would also be appropriate for the ILO to publish a document on policy packages devised in various countries on industrial restructuring and the resulting labour relations problems and their resolution. Nepal is committed to the ideals of the ILO. I am happy to inform you that our new Government is in the process of ratifying a number of suitable ILO Conventions.

We are looking forward to a fruitful discussion; I am confident that at the end of the Conference we will be richer in knowledge and ideas for the betterment of our people.

Original – Russian: Mr. BATBAYAR (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – I would like to congratulate the President upon his election to this post and wish him every success.

I agree with the views expressed and assessments made by previous speakers, representatives of workers from many States, with regard to the activities of the Governing Body and the Director-General during the period under review, and the contents of the Report Democratisation and the ILO. Whilst democratisation is a prerequisite for self-determination and development, there are problems facing all States and peoples, whether they have democratic traditions or are starting anew on the road to democracy. Of cause this has particular importance for those people who until recently were still living under a totalitarian regime. The Director-General in his Report stressed the fact that "the countries now in the process of establishing democracy, and those proud of their long-standing parliamentary traditions are all committed to the cause of democratisation". There is no question about this.

In Mongolia, the political climate is changing radically in favour of democracy. The recently approved Constitution proclaims the basic rights and freedoms of the people: the right to life, free speech, freedom of association, the multi-party system, as well as the independence and impartiality of the judiciary. Very soon new elections to the Great People's Hural (Parliament) will be held. The Parliament will be elected by direct and free suffrage. There are ten parties and party groups taking part in the election campaign. This shows how quickly and how radically the country is transforming itself. However, economic changes are lagging far behind political transformation. Mass privatisation, price liberalisation and free investment are indeed taking place but are not yet showing any tangible results. Output has fallen by 30 to 50 per cent, inflation is running into three figures, unemployment is at between 7 and 8 per cent and, we expect, will soon reach 10 per cent. All this forces us to think about ways in which we can help the country out of the quagmire in the shortest time possible and protect the workers from the danger of widespread poverty. All patriotic forces including trade unions must focus their attention and their efforts on solving these problems and difficulties. In this connection, it is appropriate to quote from the Director-General's Report, which says: "the manifest failure of centralised economic planning has undoubtedly a major role in the willingness to democratise, but the threat hanging over democracy as a result of the economic crisis is all too real. No effort must therefore be spared to prevent the hopes borne of political liberation from being frustrated by upheavals in the country."

As regards the changes in Mongolian trade unions, despite all the difficulties we face we can say with confidence that we are well on our way towards finding a compromise between innovation and tradition which has helped us in a very short space of time to set up a sound and independent trade union able to adapt to changes in society. Today the Federation of Mongolian Trade Unions is a highly influential and representative organisation of Mongolian workers, and occupies a fitting place in the new democratic structure of our society. Nowadays, the Federation boasts a membership comprising over 80 per cent of the workforce.

The Federation of Mongolian Trade Unions is almost the only representative of consequence defending the interests of its members and, in fact, all workers. As such it was able to force the Government to establish subsistence and social minimum standards, including minimum wages. These social standards have been raised twice in the last eight months in relation with the inflation rate. This means that the indexation of the population's income levels is now acknowledged and serves as an appropriate guarantee, sustaining minimum living conditions for the people and in particular for vulnerable groups.

Collective bargaining has become the norm at the enterprise level, at economic establishments and local and central management bodies, and it has become a fixture in the legal and practical order. Still, it is one thing to agree on such normative documents and it is quite another to apply them in practice. Unilateral efforts and isolated trade union activity have no tangible effect when it comes to the application of such agreements in practice. The Mongolian trade unions are now working to create a national tripartite mechanism to attain an overall social consensus, inspired by the ILO's universal priority given to tripartism. Our efforts have already borne the first fruit, as a first mechanism has been created and has begun working.

While safeguarding freedom of association and trade union pluralism, we must be careful, as is correctly mentioned in the Report, to avoid a splintering of the trade union movement and to ensure its unity in defending its interests and the principle of worker participation. International worker solidarity and cooperation with international trade union federations has been and will remain an extremely important factor for the national development of all trade unions. By maintaining our traditionally friendly relations we have successfully developed cooperation with the Russian independent trade union and the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, as well as with the trade union federation in Khazakstan. In addition we have begun cooperating with trade unions that are members of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, such as the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO), the National Trade Union Congress of Singapore (NTUC), the Asian Pacific Regional Organization (APRO), American trade unions (AFL-CIO) and the Israeli General Federation of Labour (Histadrut), etc.

As in the past, the ILO is currently providing member organisations with a range of assistance. Mongolian trade unions have been no exception. The ILO and its Workers' Education Branch have provided us with constant support. For example, a two-week seminar on "The Market and Trade Unions" has been held for officials of Mongolian trade unions, and our personnel has been trained at the Turin Centre.

In concluding I should like to make a remark about the International Labour Office. The ILO is already making a significant contribution to social reforms which must be prepared through political and economic changes, and it intends to carry on doing so in the future as well. Such contributions will be complemented by a programme against poverty, which in its turn shall aim to reach concrete objectives.

Original – French: Mr. EL MOKHAREK (Workers' delegate, Morocco) – Allow me first of all, on behalf of all the Moroccan workers, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to guide the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It was with great satisfaction that my organisation, the Union of Moroccan Workers (UMT), read the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO. I should like to commend it on its intellectual excellence and powerful political and social impact. On behalf of the Moroccan workers, for whom you have once again embodied their principles, concerns and many objectives, the Union of Moroccan Workers extends its heartfelt congratulations. Similarly, the UMT expresses its gratitude for the vast quantity of work carried out by the ILO during the past year – and for its quality. It reflects the vitality of tripartism and total concordance with the extraordinary changes which our world is experiencing.

The Director-General aptly demonstrated the close connection between democracy and development. He highlighted the fact that democracy is the result of a lasting learning process everywhere. And then he illustrated with clear lucidity the so-called risks of democratisation when it comes into play in societies which have been under the yoke of dictatorship and poverty for too long.

But the greatest threat to democracy today, at the precise time when its becoming more universal, is that the partners of democratic changes – the workers and peoples – might not benefit from it. As you so clearly stated, economic expansion and social justice often lag behind. But this is not merely a question of pace; the direction this change takes is sometimes involved.

Peoples who witnessed the magnificent tide of decolonisation quickly realised that the success of the national movement was not – far from it – synonymous with the success of the democratic movement. The workers who, everywhere, were the vanguard of national liberation failed to reap the political, material and social reward of national independence.

History seems to be repeating itself today. In what we call the New World Order, as in structural adjustment programmes, there is a great vacuum, fraught with danger and despair. This is what the UMT calls the absence of any ambitious project or social dimension.

The social sphere is neither a residual dimension of development nor a peripheral value of democracy. It is not a charity to attenuate or make bearable poverty, exclusion, unemployment, disease or old-age.

We believe that the social field is intended to meet the needs of the most disadvantaged: peasants, workers, women and the unemployed.

We wish to see it as such – and to defend it and shoulder it as a network of dynamic rights guaranteeing a true partnership with producers.

In order for this to be achieve, the workers' trade union organisations must be recongnised and respected as an independent and full partner.

The Union of Moroccan Workers regrets to have to say once again that we are far from our objectives.

Trade union independence, the immense value of which the Report of the Director-General rightly stresses, continues to be overlooked in too many countries, including Morocco. The subordination of trade unionism to a political party has perhaps become less commonplace in Eastern Europe; but this does not mean that it does not exist elsewhere under many and dangerous disguises. The Workers' opponents, who are always opposed to democracy, have stepped up their cunningness to undermine trade union independence.

First of all, there is direct brutal repression. To silence authentic trade unionism, they resort to conventional tactics which range from administrative harassment and court summonses to arbitrary dismissals.

Thus, this year, the Union of Moroccan Workers has seen a number of its most fervent members lose their jobs and their freedom because they hold a UMT membership card or because they exercise a legitimate trade union activity within the framework of our organisation. In 1992, the Union of Moroccan Workers organised two general strikes in the cities of Mohammedia and Tangiers and a general strike throughout the chemicals sector to defend the right to organise.

But there is another form of repression, which is practiced in my country, Morocco. There is another insiduous and deadly type of repression. In order to weaken free trade unionism, which is the only authentic trade unionism, the same opponents manipulate the principle of pluralism by devising a trade union plurality which is absurd and artificial. They create bogus organisations full of "blacklegs" to divide the workers, undermine their struggles, destroy their representativity and their capacity to intervene. In a nutshell they wish to do away with trade unionism. On behalf of pluralism and democracy, they wish to do away with trade unionism. On behalf of pluralism and democracy, they wish to bring trade union independence to its knees and give a regressive and destructive meaning to the very idea of democracy.

We cannot insist too much on this. Independent trade unionism is a bugbear. Ir is considered as a factor which stops political systems from moving aimlessly. These political systems have never offered any choice to their citizens between a lack of freedom or official democracy; a false democracy built on the artificial plurality of an organisation without foundations and on bogus, badly elected assemblies which perpetuate falsehood and the confusion of powers.

This is the key to the problem and there is one underlying common component: anti-trade union repression is fuelled by the collusion of authorities with irresponsible employers. It has as its root the absence of democracy; it is assisted by political brigades and bogus trade unions entrusted with dividing the ranks of authentic trade union members.

The workers have the right to be protected against such interferences and against such infringements to their independence of action, opinion and organisation. The right to organise cannot be dissociated from trade union independence. The UMT will continue to campaign so that the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which is one of the greatest legislative achievements of workers, is not only ratified and complied with, but it also be enriched as an instrument of prevention against the infringements to trade union independence.

Moroccan workers remain faithful to the history of their emancipation struggle. From this prestigious rostrum where their ceaseless fight for dignity and freedom has taken them, they join together with all the other workers of the world, in their common aspirations and interest for social justice and democracy. They are equally attached to the fostering of development – as long as they may reap their fair benefits from this process.

There is no complete and exportable model of democracy but there are universal principles of democracy. These principles are such that democracy becomes simple and clear.

Democracy exists when accounts are rendered to workers and to the people on the management of the country; when the government is a responsible government before those elected by the nation; when the assemblies are freely and sincerely elected and can be dissolved by suffrage; when justice is independent; when the administration is healthy and able to make just choices for the benefit of all; when there is participation and mobilisation of workers and the population in collective decisions. Only then is there a true separation of powers. This means that there has been an adoption of clear constitutional rules, intended and respected by all.

That is the true meaning of the struggle of the UMT and this is also the direction we have found in the Report of the Director-General at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are proud to see our struggle be part and parcel of the universal principles of our time. On behalf of all the Moroccan workers, we congratulate the Director-General of the Organisation for his excellent statement.

Mrs. PUHAR (Minister of Labour, Slovenia) – It gives me a great pleasure to express my deepest feelings of appreciation at the admission of Slovenia into the family of the International Labour Organisation. Becoming a member of such an eminent international organisation is an historical event for the Republic of Slovenia. Thus, our newly-born State has now become, after its admission to the United Nations Organisation, the World Health Organisation, and UNICEF, a member of another specialised United Nations agency.

As a member State of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Slovenia has already participated in the work of the International Labour Organisation as well as in the implementation of Conventions ratified by what was formerly Yugoslavia.

The Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia states that Slovenia is a legally and socially responsible State. By joining the International Labour Organisation and by the fulfilment of Conventions adopted by the International Labour Organisation, Slovenia will be putting this constitutional principle into practice as well.

In spite of its relatively high level of development, and the fact that our national labour legislation is already well adapted to European legislation, the Republic of Slovenia is facing major economic difficulties even after international recognition of its independence. This is another reason why Slovenia will greatly appreciate the expert assistance of the International Labour Organisation during the ratification of new Conventions and the further reconciliation of their content with our national legislation.

The Republic of Slovenia, as a member of the International Labour Organisation, accepts all obligations arising from the statutes of this Organisation and vows to continue to fulfil in the future all the obligations imposed on Slovenia by the Conventions ratified by the former Yugoslavia.

I would like to stress that the Republic of Slovenia will do its utmost to accomplish the goals of this important specialised agency of the United Nations.

This membership brings Slovenia new possibilities for cooperation as well as an opportunity to strengthen already existing ties.

Allow me to emphasise once again our great appreciation of the membership of my country in the International Labour Organisation and of the invitation to this 79th Session which covers many items we are dealing with at this very moment in Slovenia.

Original – Spanish: Mr CHAVEZ (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) – On behalf of the workers of Ecuador and their delegation attending this session of the Conference, and on my behalf, I should like first of all to express my heartfelt congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and his colleagues upon their election to preside over the debates of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and join previous speakers in believing that their skilful leadership will enable us to reach important conclusions.

Without any doubt, the subject of the Report of the Director-General this year, Democratisation and the ILO, is of singular importance, especially if we take into account the sweeping and unexpected economic, political and technological changes which have occured in the world. On the one hand, there is the collapse of the regimes of Eastern and Central Europe, whose peoples now are making major efforts to establish democratic systems and lay the bases for sustained development and conditions of freedom, equality and social justice. Then there are countries from Africa, Asia and Latin America which have been able to establish constitutional regimes and which are zealously seeking the path of democracy. The ever increasing globalisation of the economy and the dizzying technological pace are in turn requiring constant and dynamic changes in development strategies, both from the countries of the North and countries of the South, as well as in labour relations.

At the same time it seems obvious that some powers and transnational corporations which supported or promoted dictaatorships, particularly in Latin America, have decided to relinquish this infamous practice.

Many of these dictatorial regimes caused irreparable economic, social, political and cultural damage to our countries. In the field of human rights, thousands of assassinated, disappeared, tortured, exiled and imprisoned people are the result of these regimes which were imposed by arms and bloodshed. International conscience should not forget these facts, even though the regimes remain unpunished. It is indispensable to create the conditions and mechanisms precisely within the framework of democracy so as to prevent similar situations from occuring again.

The statement made by the Director-General that "in a break with the past, the international organisations have been establishing a direct link between human rights, democracy and development" is thus of great importance.

I should like to emphasise the reference made by the Director-General to the significant fact that the ILO has always struggled for the highest democratic values, defending freedom, equality and social justice. Indeed, its contribution on behalf of these objectives is immeasurable, and has merited full recognition and credibility and the pride of people throughout the world.

We share the opinion of the Director-General that democracy is not just a simple act of placing a ballot in a voting box at certain fixed times, since for the workers of my country the concept of political, economic and social justice to end poverty and promote the complete well-being of all citizens is the democracy that we want to achieve.

We are aware that in order to achieve these major objectives we will have to overcome innumerable difficulties. The responsible and serious participation of all sectors of society will be needed, in particular on the part of workers, employers and the Government.

However, this is a task and challenge that we should take up immediately. Otherwise, as Mr. Pérez de Cuéllar, the former Secretary-General of the United Nations, pointed out, "genuine political democracy has little chance to survive… without social justice".

Today, when structural adjustment programmes are being implemented in several developing countries, the immediate results of which have been an exacerbation of poverty, an increase in unemployment, and in general a constant worsening of living conditions and when other countries are making the transition from centrally planned economies to market economy development models with similar immediate results, the definition and application of coherent strategies for the establishment of democracies which will meet the needs of human being are of special importance. As the Report points out, such strategies must be based on the right to pursue material well-being and spiritual development in conditions of freedom of dignity, economic security and equal opportunities.

It is encouraging to note that the Director-General's Report emphasises the need for the participation of everyone in the life of society and the State and that tripartism is a fundamental element for the consolidation and development of democracy.

The concepts, criteria, opinions and recommendations on the values of democracy in the Director-General's Report, and their application and objectives will, if they are espoused by governments and employers, lead the workers of my country to hope that we are beginning to move on the right path towards the objectives of social justice for which we are constantly struggling.

It is to be hoped that some governments and certain employers, such as those in my country, who seem to have reached the conclusion that in order to impose structural adjustment policies it is absolutely necessary to destroy the fundamental rights of the workers, especially those concerning freedom of association, collective bargaining, and the right to strike, and to weaken trade union organisations, will, after reading this excellent report on democratisation and the ILO, mend their ways and realise that lasting democracy and economic and social progress will not be achieved without strong, independent and autonomous trade union organisations. In fact, in my country, Ecuador, the line of thought of the President of the Republic is that trade unionism in the public sector is the shortest path towards the dissolution of the State. The policy of the Government is reflected in the imposition of labour reforms that infringe international labour Conventions ratified by Ecuador, especially Conventions Nos 87 and 98, as well as several provisions of the Constitution of the Republic. Thus, the Ecuadorian Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Confederation of Ecuadorian Workers have lodged a complaint with the competent bodies of the ILO in order to achieve the restitution of the fundamental rights of workers in Ecuador. There is also a constant and systematic campaign of disparagement and slander against the trade union movement and its leaders, designed to delegitimise the trade union organisations in society. The economic policies imposed by the Government have led to an increase in unemployment and underemployment, which now stand at 14 and 56 per cent, respectively, of the working population, according to the economic research institutes of several universities in the country. The minimum wage is equivalent to US$29 per month, and is probably the lowest in Latin America. The worsening of living conditions of the workers and of most the population has reached alarming and unprecedented levels.

We are fully satisfied with the Director-General's proposal that the ILO should contribute even more to the promotion of social reforms to the accompany necessary political and economic changes, and his call for specific programmes to fight poverty. We trust that this commitment refers not only to the countries of Central and Eastern Europe but also to developing countries which maintain elitist political and economic systems.

We share the opinion of the Director-General concerning the fact that we need greater synergy between standard setting activities and technical cooperation in order to proceed towards the objectives of the ILO, noting the cross-fertilisation of all our activities. The broad experience of the ILO may offer its member States, employers and workers important contributions in the following areas: to intensify its activities to promote the application of Conventions adopted by the ILO; to provide advisory services so that effective mechanisms be adopted through the full exercise of tripartism in the conceptual framework defined by the Director-General; to increase efforts to promote productive and well-remunerated employment; to assist member States to devise policies and programmes which avoid the negative social effects of structural adjustment policies; to lend support to member States in order to promote social security and social assistance programmes which, in conformity with the proposal of the Director-General, would cover the informal sector as well; to broaden cooperation and technical assistance for the preservation and defence of the working environment and the external environment; to contribute to the strengthening and training of trade unionists and workers, in general; to continue the campaign to eradicate discrimination in all its forms; to lend technical advice for the creation and promotion of small and micro-enterprises which promote employment, monitoring the full observance of the ILO Conventions.

Finally, we should like to reiterate our conviction that the ILO, in this stage of its history, must assume a major role in the establishment of genuine democracies, associated with sustainable development, the full respect for human rights, freedom and social justice.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SOLORZANO MARTINEZ) – The last speaker is Mr. Solen, Government adviser of Turkey, who would like to avail himself of the right of reply to Mr. Aristidou, Minister of Labour and Social Insurance of Cyprus. I would like to remind you of what the President said yesterday concerning the right of reply: "The reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not to exceed two or three minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be couched in correct and parliamentary language."

Furthermore, in order not to prolong debates unduly, it has been a practice of the Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

Mr. SOLEN (Government adviser, Turkey) – My intervention will be brief. I asked for the floor to exercise my right of reply to two speakers who addressed this Conference yesterday afternoon and this morning on an issue which was unfortunately perpetrated by themselves, but which has nothing to do with the agenda item under discussion. The speakers claimed to speak in the name of all Cypriot workers and the Cypriot Government. It is obvious, however, that they really do not represent Turkish Cypriot people and Turkish workers of the island since it was no one else but their own community, i.e. the Greek Cypriot community, where these speakers apparently come from, which has unilaterally abrogated the Constitution of the island and expelled the Turkish Cypriots from the island's institutions, starting in 1960. In the light of these developments, the rhetoric voiced by the Greek Cypriot representatives from this platform in the name of a self-styled democracy, which was indeed exploited to totally annihilate the other part of the community, is nothing but a mockery.

Turkey is in favour of a comprehensive and lasting solution in Cyprus through inter-communal negotiations within the framework of the good offices of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, a process which has been under way for a long time. Turkey is determined to support a bi-communal and bi-zonal solution based on the political equality between the two communities in accordance with United Nations Security Council resolution 750.

Provisional Record

Seventy-ninth Session, Geneva, 1992

Report of the Standing Orders Committee

1. The Standing Orders Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 1992, held one sitting. It was composed of 43 members (26 Government members, 5 Employers' members and 12 Workers' members).

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Milan Beranek (Government member, Czechoslovakia);

Vice-Chairmen: Miss Cornélie Hak (Employers' member, Netherlands); Mr. Khurshid Ahmed (Workers' member, Pakistan).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 79th Session (Provisional Record No. 2) which proposed certain amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference designed to improve the functioning of the Conference. These dealt with two different matters.

Shortening of time-limits for speeches in plenary sittings

4. The Chairman stated that the amendment to Article 14, paragraph 6 was designed to introduce into the Standing Orders a reform which had already been successfully applied on an experimental basis at the last session of the Conference, namely the reduction of the maximum permitted length of speeches from 15 to ten minutes. This amendment was unanimously supported by the members of the Committee.

5. The Committee accordingly proposes to the Conference that it amend the first sentence of Article 14, paragraph 6 of the Standing Orders as follows:[1]

> 6. Except with the special consent of the Conference no speech, whether by a delegate, a visiting minister or a representative of an international organisation, shall exceed [15] 10 minutes exclusive of the time for translation.

Constitution of Conference Committees

6. In introducing this subject, the representative of the Secretary-General stated it involved amendments to Articles 4, 9, 25, 72 and 75 which were designed to rationalise and simplify the procedure for the appointment of Conference committees so as to enable the Conference to start its substantive work on the afternoon of the first day of the session instead of only on the second day. This time-table was in fact already being tried out at the present session under the existing Standing Orders but this had led to a confused and complicated opening sitting, which would be avoided in the future if the proposed amendments were adopted.

7. The essence of the proposed change was that most of the Conference committees would be appointed directly by the Conference itself, without the intervention of the Selection Committee. This required the following amendments (taking them in the order in which business is transacted and not the numerical order of the Standing Orders). First, Articles 72 and 75 required amending to allow the groups to hold official meetings before the Conference had formally been opened, in order to draw up their proposals for membership of committees. Secondly, Article 25, paragraph 3 had to be amended to provide that at the first sitting the Conference itself would set up most of the committees and appoint their members on the basis of the proposals of the groups. Thirdly, Articles 4 and 9 required amending to delete the references to the role of the Selection Committee in the initial appointment of committees.

8. A further amendment proposed to Article 4, paragraph 2 was designed to eliminate the need for daily meetings of the Selection Committee by expressly empowering it to delegate in particular its routine functions to its officers.

9. The Employers' members supported all the proposed amendments, and emphasised that the experience of the opening sitting had shown how useful they would be. Two positive elements that they particularly welcomed were the delegation to the officers of the Selection Committee of its routine functions and the recognition of the group meetings on the day preceding the opening of the Conference as official meetings. This meant that the governments should bear the expenses of those meetings, and the Employers' members hoped that governments would respect this provision. Finally, the Employers' members stressed the importance of ensuring that the Credentials Committee was established as soon as possible so that objections and questions of quorum could be dealt with as soon as they arose.

10. The Workers' members supported all the points made by the Employers' members. They recalled that the proposed amendments had been carefully prepared by the Governing Body through its Working Party on Improvements in the Functioning of the International Labour Conference and its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

[1] Passages that it is proposed to delete are between square brackets whilst those to be inserted are in italics.

11. There being no opposition to any of the proposed amendments the Committee approved them without further discussion. It therefore proposes to the Conference that it adopt the following amendments to its Standing Orders:

Article 4, paragraph 2

It shall be the duty of the Selection Committee to arrange the programme of the Conference, to fix the time and agenda for the plenary sittings, [to make proposals relating to the setting up and composition of other committees,] and to report to the Conference on any other questions requiring a decision for the proper conduct of its business, in accordance with the Conference Standing Orders. Where appropriate, the Committee may delegate any of these functions to its Officers.

Article 9

[Procedure for the appointment of committees]

Adjustments to the membership of committees

The following rules shall apply to all committees appointed by the Conference with the exception of the Selection Committee, the Credentials Committee, the Finance Committee of Government Representatives and the Drafting Committee:

(a) [when it has been decided to appoint a committee to which these rules apply, the Selection Committee shall fix the size of such committee and shall ask each group to furnish a list setting out in order of preference a larger number of names than there are places allocated to the group on the committee;] once the various committees have been established and their initial membership appointed by the Conference, it shall be for the Selection Committee to propose to the Conference, for its approval, subsequent changes in the composition of such committees;

[(b) the Selection Committee shall examine the lists furnished by the three groups and, if it appears desirable that any adjustment should be made in the composition of the committee so as to secure representation more adequate for the subject with which the committee will deal or more satisfactory as regards the allocation of seats to the various nationalities, shall endeavour to secure such adjustment, subject to the approval of the representatives of the groups who are present;]

[(c) the lists agreed upon by the Selection Committee shall be reported to the Conference for its approval;]

(b) [(d)] if a delegate has not been nominated by his group to sit on any committee, he may bring the matter to the notice of the Selection Committee which shall have power to place him on one or more committees, enlarging the number of members of such committee or committees accordingly. Any such request shall be made to the Chairman of the Selection Committee [at the latest at the sitting following that at which it fixed the composition of the committee or committees in question]:

(c) [(e)] in accordance with article 18 of the Constitution of the Organisation, the Conference may add to any committee to which these rules apply technical experts who shall have the right to take part in the discussions but not to vote.

Article 25

1. The Conference shall be opened by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, assisted by the other Officers of the Governing Body. These provisional Officers shall continue to act until the President of the Conference has assumed office.

2. In his opening address, the Chairman of the Governing Body shall present the report of the Governing Body on its work.

3. The first business of the Conference shall be the election of the President. The Conference shall then receive the nominations made by the groups and shall proceed to elect the three Vice-Presidents and to set up the various committees and appoint their members on the basis of proposals from the groups.

[4. The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups shall then meet separately to elect their own Officers and to decide on their nominations for the three Vice-Presidents of the Conference and for the members of the Selection Committee.]

4. [5.] (1) In order to facilitate the choice of Officers of the Conference who are all of different nationalities as required by article 3, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, the three groups share priority of nomination for the designation of Vice-Presidents of the Conference in the rotation indicated in the following table:

. . . .

(2) If a group nominates a Vice-President of the same nationality as the Vice-President nominated by a group possessing priority of nomination, such nomination shall be void.

5. [6.] In accordance with article 4, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, the Government group shall nominate 28 members for the Selection Committee and the Employers' and Workers' groups shall each nominate 14 members. In none of these groups shall any Member of the Organisation have more than one member.

[7. The Conference shall then meet again in plenary sitting to receive the nominations made by the groups and shall proceed to elect the three Vice-Presidents and to appoint the Selection Committee.]

[8. The Selection Committee shall then meet and, after electing its Officers, shall proceed to frame proposals for the number of committees to be appointed by the Conference and their composition.]

[9. The proposals made by the Committee shall be submitted to the Conference for approval.]

[10. The Government, Employers' and Workers' groups shall then meet to make their nominations for the membership of committees in accordance with the provisions of article 9.]

Article 72, paragraph 1(Correction of the English text only)

Each group shall hold official meetings for the transaction of the following business, in accordance with the Conference Standing Orders: ...

Article 72, paragraph 2

At the first official meeting of each group, [which shall be held as soon as possible after the Conference meets,] a representative of the Secretariat shall be present, if the group so desires, to inform the group as to procedure.

Article 75, paragraph 2

[As soon as the Selection Committee has come to a decision as to the number of committees to be set up,] At the first official meeting of the group, the delegates of each government shall inform the Secretary of the group, in writing, upon which committees their government desires representation and in what order of preference.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

SECOND REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. NASCIMENTO RODRIGUES) – The first item on the agenda today is the second report of the Selection Committee which appears in Provisional Record No. 6A. This report includes some changes in the composition of the Committees. I put it to you for adoption.

If there are no objections, I will consider it as adopted.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT (Mr. NASCIMENTO RODRIGUES) – We now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. COLLIS (Minister of Labour and Cooperatives, Trinidad and Tobago) – On behalf of the Government, delegates and people of the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago, permit me to extend my warmest greetings to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and to add my voice to those who have gone before, in congratulating him on his election to the Presidency of this august body.

It is indeed an honour for me, as Minister of Labour and Cooperatives, representing the recently democratically elected Government of Trinidad and Tobago, to have the opportunity of delivering this my maiden address to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, which is discussing the Report of the Director-General, Democratisation and the ILO. Democracy is well entrenched in Trinidad and Tobago. We are keenly aware of the rights and obligations which a democratic society places on governments and citizens. In his Report to the Conference, the Director-General has correctly noted that regardless of the social and political system, a State must satisfy the basic needs of its population. This imperative is even more pressing, I would submit, for a democratically elected Government with a highly literate and politically conscious population to serve. Employment is clearly a primary means by which the basic need of our citizens are satisfied and I will comment later on how my country has responded to this challenge while in the midst of an internal adjustment programme.

My Government is pleased to see that the issue of the prevention of industrial disasters is being once again ventilated at this level. Domestically, we have employed extensive consultation techniques and procedures to update and broaden the nature and scope of existing occupational safety and health legislation; broadened to cover almost all workers more effectively by minimising health hazards resulting from exposure to chemical and physical pollutants.

Even the best legislation will not accomplish its aims without the active involvement of the social partners. We have, therefore, encouraged the partners to discuss the issue bilaterally and also at the tripartite level. We have advocated the establishment of joint worker/manager safety and health committees mandated to identify, oversee and review measures taken to ensure that safety and health standards are achieved and maintained in the workplace.

Further, since the working environment and the general environment are "two sides of the same coin" and consequently require a comprehensive and holistic policy in this area, my Government intends to establish an Environment Protection Agency (EPA) which will serve to establish and enforce environmental standards. It is intended that these measures will form the basis of a comprehensive and cohesive policy on the environment which will hereafter guide our nation along a path of sustained and sustainable growth and development.

I am sure that the report on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer is of special concern to many present here today.

In my own country, and in the context of internal adjustment measures, some 10,000 cases of retrenchment were reported to the Ministry of Labour and Cooperatives between 1986 and 1990.

Against this background, the Government introduced a Retrenchment and Severance Benefits Act, retroactive to 1985, which accorded legislative protection to workers retrenched on the basis of redundancy. Moreover, the Companies Ordinance was also amended to allow workers' claims to be given priority treatment on the insolvent companies' floating assets.

These measures have indeed afforded workers some degree of protection. However, of even greater value would be the implementation of programmes which could lead to the creation of permanent and productive jobs for our workers. This concern has been squarely placed on our national agenda.

Indeed, the recent conduct of general elections in Trinidad and Tobago provided the opportunity for the people of my country to reassess just where we are headed as a people.

One of the major concerns coming out of this national reassessment has been the issue of rising unemployment, especially among my country's youth – with all its attendant social ills.

Unemployment in Trinidad and Tobago at the end of 1991 was officially estimated to be at 18.5 per cent. In absolute terms, this represents some 91,200 persons over the age of 15. Were these statistics to include those discouraged persons who are no longer actively seeking employment and those who are underemployed, the national employment rate would have been significantly higher. More disquieting is the concentration of unemployment among the youth, particularly recent graduates of secondary and tertiary institutions, and among women.

Grim though this picture may be, it is none the less familiar to many of the countries represented here today. Solving this problem calls not only for critical academic research but also for innovative coping strategies. Employment and job creation can no longer be deemed to be solely the responsibility of the State, nor can it be left solely to the market mechanism. Employment – as job creation – is "everybody's business".

For its part, and using this theme, the Government of Trinidad and Tobago recently convened a Tripartite National Symposium on Employment and Job Creation. By taking this action we sought to: (i) sensitise the nation to the dangers of sustained unemployment with a view to employment generation over the short-term; (ii) alert participants and the wider community to the real dangers, the extent of suffering, the threat to safety and stability, as well as to the standard of living associated with current levels of unemployment; and finally, (iii) to devise strategies, with the cooperation and assistance of the partners and the national community, to relieve the social and economic pressures associated with structural adjustment.

Over four days, 21 working groups considered more than 200 written project proposals. A number of these projects were targeted for immediate implementation. Major sectoral emphasis was placed on agriculture (including horticulture), manufacturing, construction and the hydrocarbon industries. Of particular note was the appointment of a committee with responsibility for the setting up of a National Apprenticeship Scheme aimed at developing the talents of our youth.

A Tripartite Task Force was appointed to oversee the implementation of the projects. To further demonstrate its results-oriented approach to the challenge of employment and job creation, the Government recommended – and the Symposium agreed – that the body be reconvened in October 1992. At that time, progress made in the implementation of the decisions will be reviewed and alternative strategies developed where necessary.

It was a magnificent example of tripartism in action. What was most appreciatively visible during the Symposium was the social partners working enthusiastically together, united in the common cause of ensuring that the nation survive and prosper.

The recognition by the ILO that poverty anywhere in the world is a threat to prosperity everywhere deserves renewed attention; for the threat of unemployment in the Third World countries – such as my own – is as much a threat to us as it is to other countries of the developed world. Let us call it the "boomerang effect". It is evident therefore that the attention both of the developed countries and of international organisations such as the ILO must be directed towards the alleviation of this most serious problem.

The ILO has assisted Trinidad and Tobago in its efforts to meet its several challenges. This includes the preparation of a comprehensive technical report entitled "The challenge of employment promotion: Trinidad and Tobago in the 1990s"

Quite recently, ILO officials of the Caribbean Office met with my Ministry in an effort to identify priority areas in which there could be mutual cooperation. One such area for our urgent attention is the development of cooperatives in Trinidad and Tobago. These are community-based organisations with the potential for increasing self-employment and for the alleviation of the unemployment problem as a whole.

It is my hope that micro-states such as my own will not see the significance of their problems diminished in this period of political transformation and economic austerity. We are doing our part to maintain a thriving democracy. But the developed world also has its part to play, for democracy cannot be taken for granted – nor does it end at the polls. It needs nurturing and constant attention and only through steadfast vigilance and mutual support can we ensure its survival.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIFA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Bahrain) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure to convey to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues my congratulations on the confidence vested in him by the members of this Conference. I would also like to convey to the Director-General of the ILO my appreciation of the efforts he made in the preparation of his Report, Democratisation and the ILO, and also of his success in explaining this issue in a scientific and comprehensive manner.

In the Introduction to his Report, the Director-General asked two major questions: what contribution can the ILO make to the member States to help them attain democracy; and how can the ILO make an adjustment to remain faithful to its fundamental mission and to strive for greater democracy and greater social justice? In order to participate in this dialogue on these major questions I would like to emphasise the following.

First, the democratic changes which the world is witnessing today are threatened by various factors: the international economic crisis, the increasing number of people who do not wish to participate in public life, the emergence of ethnic and racial conflicts and the total divorce between democratic form and content which results in a lowering in living standards of populations and makes democracy an abstract concept unable to meet their basic needs. In this respect, I would like to add that experience has shown that any successful democratic change must go hand in hand with a move towards a market economy. This change must be compatible with social and cultural development – irrespective of any empty slogans. Populations should be allowed to shape their own identity and attain democracy in ways that are suitable to them – provided that these coincide with the general objectives of democracy.

Second, we fully support the Director-General's proposal that the ILO should mainly strive, in the coming years, to build a society that is both just and democratic and that this effort should be accompanied by democratic reforms and support for programmes attempting to establish social justice. In this context, we agree with the Director-General that in helping its member States achieve democracy, the ILO could make a number of contributions: it could help strengthen tripartite representation and could also increase assistance to member States wishing to revise their labour legislation – either entirely or in part – so that it might be in line with international labour standards; and the ILO might also help member States in their attempts to overcome all discrimination – by striving for equality of opportunity as regards employment, working conditions and equality between men and women. Finally, the ILO might also support efforts to create a market economy characterised by social justice providing social protection for the unemployed, women, young persons, older persons, the disabled and agricultural workers. It is vital that economic policies aimed at reducing budgetary deficits should contain a social dimension so as to make them acceptable to the general population. Only in this way can lasting economic growth be guaranteed. The ILO is also there to advise employers and workers who wish to set up occupational organisations and to provide assistance required by the member States.

Third, as regards the assistance the ILO might give member States to help them establish democracy, it should be pointed out that the discovery of democratic values is not a recent phenomenon for the ILO. Many of these values are enshrined in the ILO's Constitution which has always upheld these values thanks to its tripartite structure. The ILO's experience has also shown the value of this approach and its importance for development – without which there can be no democracy.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-DERHEM (Minister of Labour, Social Affairs and Housing, Qatar) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am very happy to be able to start my statement by addressing to the President on behalf of the delegation of the State of Qatar, our most sincere congratulations on his election as President of this Session of the International Labour Conference and I would like to wish him every success in this very difficult task and wish the Conference every success in its work.

The theme chosen by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference confirms, and rightly so, the fact that the International Labour Organisation is playing both a special and a significant role with regard to the events and developments occurring on the international scene. It is keeping abreast of the latest developments and is playing an important part in shaping them, based on the objectives of the Organisation, namely development, progress and justice for all.

Our special circumstances have perhaps made it possible for the State of Qatar to achieve very important progress in the area of economic and social development, and also to bring about a qualitative transformation in the State and in its public and private institutions in a very brief period of time.

We would simply like to say very briefly that during the last 20 years we have completed our infrastructure, and that institutions have been established in the areas of health, education, social issues and information. This has been accompanied by impressive urban and industrial recovery and on-going efforts to increase the amount of land available to agriculture. As a result of its infrastructure the State now provides free services in the areas of education and health. It has built free homes for the poor and has distributed plots of land to civil servants and other employees and granted them preferential interest-free loans to allow them to build their own homes.

A number of other projects and services have been set up to help people and to encourage them to develop their own potential, for it is people who constitute the true wealth of a state. The State tries to provide a dignified standard of living for its citizens throughout their lives. These achievements are the fruit of the wise and enlightened policy of their Highnesses the reigning Prince and the crown Prince, and they reflect the State's desire that all members of society should enjoy its wealth. Thus the State is the principal investor in the financing of projects and in the provision of services and employment opportunities.

This approach could, of course, have led to undesirable ideas and behaviour, changing citizens into dependants relying on State subsidies. However, the State intends to develop human resources and help all members of society to contribute to the development of the State because the State's resources are limited, whereas the wealth of human resources can be boundless if we give people the chance to work and achieve continuous progress in the areas of thought, culture and creativity.

On this point, we feel the ILO could play an important role in establishing the necessary framework in which to develop our own capacity fully and develop society in a coordinated manner in order to promote the efficiency of all sectors of our economy.

This does not mean that the State is being asked to stand aside or to shake off its responsibilities with regard to the need to achieve development and social well-being. In developing countries where economic sectors are generally weaker, people look to the State, which is the principal driving force behind the development process, to help those sectors to shoulder their full responsibilities and to carry out their plans and programmes. The State, for its part, turns to those sectors and expects them to shoulder their responsibilities as regards development and the improvement of the living and working conditions of society in order to relieve the burden on the State and public institutions.

All this leads us to conclude that there has to be a healthy balance between the obligations and duties of the State and its public institutions and the people in order to establish an atmosphere conducive to creative activities, for all must work together to achieve social justice in a constantly changing society.

With regard to dialogue, I would just like to mention the fact that our social customs and practices mean that we do not attach any importance to bureaucratic barriers. The doors of officials, however important they are, are always open. This has made it possible to establish direct relations and to respond to the needs, the wishes and the aspirations of all.

Finally we would like to emphasise the importance of the link between democratisation and development at the national level and also at the level of international cooperation. It is quite clear that a large number of developing countries are facing difficult circumstances which hinder the attainment of their objectives of progress and development. These peoples believe that international détente and the end of the cold war should result in the availability of enormous amounts of material and technical assistance which could be used to benefit needy countries. We hope that developed countries will adopt significant initiatives in this area, for this would give a true human dimension to international cooperation.

We do not forget the fact that some countries live in fear of foreign threats which are levelled at their material and human resources. They look to the international community to protect their rights and to ensure their safety. Freedom cannot flourish alongside poverty, or where development takes place in an atmosphere of fear. We must therefore give democracy an international dimension so that peoples can live in safety and peace and enjoy their share of the earth's wealth.

Mr. HILB (Employers' delegate, Israel) – It gives me pleasure to join other speakers in congratulating the President on his election. My congratulations also go to the Vice-Presidents.

In Israel, as you know, labour relations between the employers' and the workers' organisations are based on a system of collective agreements which have, for many years now, been signed by both parties. The collective agreements and labour laws determine the working conditions and social rights of the workers. Through the years, many collective agreements were signed concerning labour relations and working conditions such as salaries, vacations, vacation pay, pensions, cost-of-living adjustments, working arrangements, the manner of conducting negotiations, etc. The decent relations and good system of communication between the employers' organisations and workers' organisation (the Histadrut) have created, through the years, concepts and rules for conducting negotiations while maintaining industrial peace. Indeed, during the last few years the private sector has not suffered too many strikes and very few labour disputes, despite the state of our economy and the occasional necessity, deriving from the financial difficulties of companies, to dismiss workers. The economic state of Israel and the rest of the world has resulted in a large increase in unemployment rates, and it is highly important that all government bodies, employers and employees work together to reduce unemployment, and that this be their main goal of activities in the near future.

One of the major events that occurred in the last years is the immigration of hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews to Israel. Absorbing these immigrants can contribute significantly to the advancement and stability of Israel in every aspect.

All the same, one of the most difficult problems is finding employment and work for hundred of thousands of immigrants. Vast efforts are made by all government bodies, employers' organisations, the Histadrut and the Government to create vacancies for the immigrants as well as for Israelis. For that purpose, large financial investments are required and the employers' organisations have submitted projects for the encouragement of Israeli and foreign investors to invest in Israel by setting up new enterprises in which immigrants and Israelis will be employed.

We are hopeful that new enterprises will be established and will bring about an improvement in the economy of Israel and a decrease in the rate of unemployment. Regarding the employment in Israel of workers from the territories, it should be pointed out that their employment is carried out in an organised manner, and they are entitled to all salary and social benefits equal to those of Israeli employees. The Israeli law prohibits the employment of workers from territories outside the National Employment Service, through which the employer is required to pay salaries to the workers and allocate the social benefits they are entitled to.

I refer now to the issue of workers' protection in the case of the insolvency of their employer which appears on this Conference agenda. In the framework of the National Insurance Fund, Israel provides protection that guarantees to the worker, in case of insolvency, payment of the salary which the employer failed to pay, plus a dismissal compensation payment. In this case, the employee is entitled to his salary and compensation from the National Insurance Fund, regardless of the employer's other debts, up to a certain ceiling established by law. Payments to the National Insurance Fund for securing these workers' rights are paid by employers alone, thereby posing a certain hardship on all employers.

It has also been established in Israeli law that sums deposited by the employer in the Pension Fund, and which are designated for payment of compensation, are not to be transferred, mortgaged or seized, and are not part of the employer's assets in the case of insolvency of the company and are designated solely for the payment of compensation to the employee. Undoubtedly, these protective measures are satisfactory and prevent a situation whereby the employee is left penniless in the event of his employer's insolvency.

Mr. MALLECK-AMODE (Workers' delegate, Mauritius) – I would like to express my appreciation and thanks for the opportunity given to me to address this important session of the Conference on behalf of the Mauritian workers, and to extend to the President my warmest congratulations on his election to the Chair and to his Vice-Presidents. The competence with which he has been directing the deliberations is yet another confirmation of his outstanding abilities and justifies the confidence placed in him. We are certain that his leadership will help ensure the proper course and successful conclusion of this session.

It is with interest that I have gone through the inventory of labour and social problems in which the ILO is involved and which forms the basis of the Director-General's Report. In a world full of dilemmas, complex as they are, there is certainly a vast gamut of unsolved problems – unemployment; inequality of income; inflation; social security; health and safety; democratisation; environment; industrial disasters; and structual adjustment – which are undeniably affected by industrialisation, investment, trade and new technology. A certain degree of adjustment is therefore necessary.

The stark realities of our time and changing needs and responsibilities demand that the ILO, with its vocation of universality and its dedication to freedom, play a more active role than ever in tackling these complex issues which are particularly acute and rampant in developing countries.

In this exercise, a reappraisal of the manner in which democratisation and the social objectives of economic policy can be achieved becomes inescapable. Democratisation, as the Report says, is but the action whereby a people assume responsibility for itself and all its component parts, exactly as individuals and their families shape their own destiny. Yet, many countries, though committed to the cause and ideals of democracy, are unfortunately not applying adequately the rules governing human rights, freedom of speech and a completely independent judicial service. They are vain words.

It is a matter of grave concern that the Sierra Leone National Provisional Ruling Council has not only confiscated the vehicles and typewriters of the Sierra Leone Labour Congress, but has also impounded the passport of Brother Kandeh Yilla, General Secretary of the Congress and Secretary of AFRO, thus preventing him from attending this important world gathering. Brother Yilla is also compelled to report to the police station daily at 9 a.m.

On the other hand, in Malawi, our distinguished Brother Chihana, who has been detained together with six employees of SATUUC, is also facing atrocity on the part of the Government in complete defiance of human rights.

On behalf of the Mauritian workers, I would like to express our solidarity with our two colleagues and through this Conference, to appeal publicly to the sense of justice and fairness of the two respective Heads of State concerned, so that they may, in the name of natural justice, human and trade union rights and industrial democracy, order the release of our colleague Chihana and the six employees of SATUUC; the lifting of the ban on trade union activities; and the return of all confiscated items belonging to the Sierra Leone Trade Union Congress.

As a member of AFRO, I move that this Conference strongly condemn such acts and that sanctions be imposed upon the countries concerned or any other government that refuses to comply with the demands of democracy which, inter alia, include: human rights; property rights; freedom of association and expression; the right to bargain collectively; the right to strike; the right to education; and the right to health care.

Although Mauritius enjoys an international reputation as regards democracy, and is seen a haven of peace and harmony, our Industrial Relations Act does not enable trade union activities to be carried out very smoothly and the right to strike cannot be executed properly. The existing machinery for arbitrating disputes, such as the permanent Arbitration Tribunal and the Industrial Relations Commission, is not giving satisfaction and doubts have been expressed as to its credibility.

Though strike actions expose the trade unions and their members to hardship, loss of jobs and loss of income, this does not obviate the fact that the possibility of ultimate recourse to industrial action should remain open to unions. Otherwise, the whole process of industrial relations is prejudiced to the disadvantage of working people. Consequently, the extremely widespread restrictions on the right to strike in many great developing countries are a source of deep concern and, if not attended to, will remain a major obstacle to the development, preservation and exercise of basic rights.

In Mauritius, though the right to strike is embodied in the Industrial Relations Act, the procedures that have to be followed render it impossible or impracticable to resort to strike action – legal as it is – the more so where compulsory arbitration is imposed on the unions. On the other hand, any strike action or lock-out which has commenced may be declared unlawful by regulation if, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, the continuance of the strike or lock-out will imperil the national economy.

Such laws if not amended are tantamount to an authoritative denial of the right to strike and muzzle trade union leaders.

Representations were made by the entire trade union movement to the Law Review Committee. I therefore hope that positive action will be taken by the Law Review Committee to render justice to the working class in the light of international labour Conventions, the rules governing industrial democracy and trade union and human rights.

We understand now from the Minister that the Law Review Committee has submitted its report to the Government and that it is now being examined by the Government. We hope that everything will be corrected in the light of the international labour Conventions.

With the changes taking place – the introduction of new technology, the liberalisation concept – it is my considered view that the ILO should pay special attention and help the workers of the Third World countries by providing them with the services of consultants to help them to participate positively in the formulation and implementation of economic and social development programmes, the more so because democratisation has been accompanied by a change in the economic system, whereby many countries have switched on to a liberal market economy. While we agree with the concept of liberalisation, we believe that the developing world should be cautious about liberalising the prices of necessities and basic commodities, as liberalisation opens up greater competition, and the forces of supply and demand, may, through concocted action among traders, lead to increased prices in commodities that take a substantial portion of a simple worker's budget, for example staple foodstuffs. For such goods, we believe that there should be a continuous control through a central body. It is therefore essential for governments to regulate the law of the market in order to provide a minimum protection to the working class in so far as prices are concerned because wages and prices are not unrelated and prices, as we know, include profits, dividends, interest, commission, advertising and other expenses. Traders would never hesitate to borrow money at high interest rates in a liberal economy and pass on the costs to the consumers and workers. Workers today remain at the mercy of most governments and suffer at the hands of unscrupulous traders in this world of cut-throat competition. Where is the protection?

Structural adjustment in Mautitius has, contrary to other developing countries, been successful and beneficial because of the establishment of social safety nets and social objectives and the enforcement of an economic structure that has taken care of technological change and competitiveness on the world market.

The package of incentives to foreign investors, coupled with an attractive fiscal policy, have indeed had far-reaching effects in that the Government has been able to bring unemployment into the control net although it is now compelled to import labour.

However, the inability of certain industries to adapt themselves to changes in technology has resulted in their closing down and job losses. The shortage of manpower has helped their absorption in other industries and firms employing new technologies. This mode of development based on cheap labour and mass production provides no security for workers who have to wander from place to place.

It should, however, be noted that, with a view to avoiding the taxpayer's net, certain unscrupulous industrialists either just close down their industries or leaves the country incognito, without paying their workers either remuneration or compensation.

I must here congratulate the Director-General for including on the agenda a subject such as protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. I have gone through the proposed text of the Convention and I believe that, in order to guarantee workers their due, the idea of "priority" should be introduced into the text of article 8.

Until the appropriate mechanisms is introduced to control the abuses taking place at the expense of the workers, the trade union movement strongly recommends the setting up of a redundancy scheme to mitigate the hardship of the workers. Industries being wound up should be able to contribute part of the proceeds to a scheme in favour of workers made redundant as a result of their action. Education and training, as pointed out in the Report, are essential elements in any structural adjustment policy as they help to make better use of the labour force, improve efficiency and productivity. Human resources development improves the ability of poor population groups to use their assets more productively.

Since training and education contribute to economic growth and development, help individual personal development and provide workers with a means of changing careers, I believe that the ILO should be under a constitutional obligation to assist its member States in the promotion of human resources development because the degree of development of a country depends to a large extent on the degree to which its human resources are developed. Basically, therefore, a country's development is the result of human development and the enhancement of the quality of knowledge and skills.

A workers' education programme, financed by the ILO, is organised by the Workers' Education unit of the Ministry of Labour and Industrial Relations. A second educational programme, financed by the AFLCIO and the ICFTU is also organised by the Mauritius Labour Congress. Coupled with them is a programme organised by the Mauritius Employers' Federation.

In the related field of vocational training, an Industrial Vocational Training Board has been set up with a view to meeting the challenge of the changes taking place. It is a self-financing institution deriving its finance through a levy of 1 per cent of workers' remuneration. Courses in various fields, such as catering, jewellery, electronics, among others, are taught. Seminars at middle management level are also held and a Sea Training School is also in operation.

The role of workers and their organisations in discharging their responsibilities towards society becomes more important day by day. The skills which they need to acquire for successful labour/management dialogue for the democratic conduct of union business require further development.

The report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is indeed a laudable one. We note with a certain degree of satisfaction that the Government of Mauritius has reported on a series of Conventions, yet we note with concern that our Government expressed its intention to amend the Dock Regulations, 1937. I cannot but hope that the Government will comply with the recommendation of the Committee. As pointed out earlier, in a country which is used as a model for the Third World and which is entering its second phase of the development, which will be capital intensive rather than labour intensive, the methods applied to review the laws are too slow.

With the coming into force of the Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act in Mauritius things have been put in their right perspective and there has been a decrease in accidents at work. However, we still have a long way to go to reach our objective. The answer would to our mind be training in first aid and disaster control. Environmental training would provision guidance in the proper handling of toxic materials.

Asbestos dumping is becoming a major problem. The ILO should therefore increase its budget in order to widen the scope of its educational programme to all sectors concerned, mainly trade union organisations, which will have a decisive role to play.

In conclusion I appeal to this Conference and the Governments represented here to accept our proposals, which aim at justice, human and trade union rights and harmonious industrial relations between unions, employers and governments based on mutual respect.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ROSALES ARGUELLO (Minister of Labour, Nicaragua) – I would like to congratulate Ibero-America for the election of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and Mr. Solózano Martínez to high office in this Conference.

It is an honour for me to address this great assembly to offer my comments on the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO. The Government of Nicaragua welcomes this subject and congratulates the Director-General for a very wise choice.

Since our Government took power on 25 April 1990, it has systematically been carrying out a transition from a totalitarian regime to a democratic regime. The Somoza and Sandinista dictatorships denied civilian society the exercise of basic freedoms like the freedom of expression, freedom of the press, freedom of association and the rights to strike, thereby reducing the economic, social and political space available to the social partners. That is why our President refers to her Government as a government of reconciliation and national reconstruction.

In the previous decade, political and trade union pluralism were weak. In fact, they existed merely for export purposes. With the State, the Army and the Party all bound up into one, there was no room for the free exercise of the basic human rights and freedoms. Strikes were considered a felony. Two days after the triumph of the Sandinista revolution, a state of emergency was decreed; it lasted until August 1987, when Nicaragua signed the so-called "Esquipulas II Treaty". In other words, tripartism could not function, since the employers and the workers were not autonomous and could not exercise their proper and specific functions. Freedom, pluralism, the participation of workers and employers in decisions which concerned them were very severely restricted.

Since 25 April 1990, the task of the Government has been to re-establish citizens' freedoms, to proclaim and guarantee political and trade union pluralism. It was in this context that on 6 May 1990, the Ministry of Labour reaffirmed the concept of trade union pluralism, making it possible for several trade unions to co-exist within a single enterprise, thus bringing monopoly in representation to an end. The Ministry also put an end to the mandatory withholding of trade union dues, thereby giving life to a series of democratic trade unions which had previously been unable to organise and operate.

These measures ended trade union monopoly in collective bargaining. The exclusionary clauses of existing collective agreements were declared null and void, and all agreements were revised in 1990.

The previous Government's practice of State intervention in the negotiation and approval of contracts was abolished. The role of the State now is merely to serve as a mediator, and to act as a conciliator between the parties. In 1991, 172 new trade unions were registered. The CAUS, CUS, CGT(i), CTN and CTN(a) Confederations now represent 53 per cent of unionised workers. The Sandinista Workers' Confederation (CST) represents 30 per cent of trade unionists, and the remaining 17 per cent includes workers belonging to autonomous unions which are not associated with any trade union confederation.

There is an explanation for this. When the Somoza regime fell, the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) co-opted all trade unions. Everyone in Nicaragua was a Sandinista. Because the revolution represented a national ideal, it was normal in those circumstances for the unions at that time to seek to come together in one single movement, the aim of which was to build a single confederation. However, the vertical and authoritarian management style which characterised the revolution, as well as the dependency of trade union organisations on the revolution's ideology, led democratic trade unions to follow their own path.

Consequently, the problem today is that some organisations are not representive enough, and the agreements which they sign are challenged by their membership. The national agreement of 12 July 1990, which ended the Sandinista mutiny was severely challenged by the membership of the Sandinista trade unions, since the agreement was negotiated directly with the national leadership of the FSLN and endorsed by the Sandinista trade unions.

The challenges are greatest for countries like ours which are emerging from totalitarian regimes and which must give up a centralised economy and move towards an unregulated market economy by privatising the so-called people's or state property, undertaking very substantial political changes and, in addition, taking a series of economic policy measures to stabilise and restructure the economy. The trade unions which were sympathetic to the previous regime as well as rank and file Sandinistas obviously wish to avoid at all costs any change which will undermine the so-called rights and benefits acquired during the revolution, which the new regime's proposed political and economic reforms appear to jeopardise.

The task facing the Government is to design a policy which provides the most vulnerable sectors, the unemployed and the destitute, sufficient social protection so that they can accept the sacrifices which the new economic policy entails.

We are fully aware that privatisation is a slow process, that structural adjustment and stabilisation measures, in their initial phases, worsen poverty and increase unemployment, but we are also aware of the fact that these measures must be taken. It is better to accept a small evil now rather than having to have to accept a greater evil later. An aggregate annual inflation of 36,000 per cent in Nicaragua is sufficient justification to take these kinds of measures and, furthermore, we can now state proudly that inflation has been reduced to zero as from May 1991.

The Government, in its search for peace, has relied on dialogue and negotiation, thus responding to the concern which the peoples demonstrated in all surveys carried out before the elections. Peace was what our population wanted most. Ten years of war had exhausted the population. Secondly, there was the economic problem – hyperinflation. The first task of the Government was therefore to negotiate peace and end the civil war, which it did on 30 May 1990. On 27 June of the same year, it began the process of disarmament, a process which is still continuing on a negotiated basis because there are still armed groups in the country.

As regards the economy, on 3 March 1991 the Government launched the economic stabilisation plan, with remarkable results. For example, there was negative inflation in May and June of 1991.

What mechanisms were used by the Government in both cases? Dialogue and concertation. Concertation has been the Government's strategy and not just a tactic.

The Government invested five weeks in the first phase of concertation and 87 days in the second.

However, the Government has encountered many difficulties in providing proper protection for the most vulnerable groups of the population – children, women, the aged, the unskilled, war invalids and long-term unemployed. Fourteen per cent of the working population is jobless, and 53 per cent is underemployed.

The reasons for this are fully known to our population: war, the deterioration of the productive structure, lack of maintenance, managerial incapacity and the corruption of the previous regime. There is no doubt that this helped the population to understand what we are up against. The new Government's democratic approch to solving problems without the use of force is evidenced by its systematic use of dialogue and negotiation. Thanks to this approach, there has been no social uprising. I do not pretend that we have not had political problems. Such problems do exist with the so-called revolutionary sectors who are now demanding financing and land. The problem can be traced to the reduction of the armed forces and the demobilisation of the resistance. Following negotiations, the Government has delivered more than 800,000 plots of land and is now looking for additional land to find a satisfactory solution to the whole problem. The former Nicaraguan resistance alone has received 423,000 plots of land, distributed among 14,000 families.

The drop in international coffee have brought conflicts to region I and II of our country. The problem is compounded by a lack of security and problems in land ownership.

The Government has made every effort to avoid the use of force, and to avoided triggering another civil war. It has sought a strictly political, negotiated solution.

I believe that the ILO can contribute by helping Nicaragua to set up a market economy with a human face, through three forms of cooperation: dealing with the problem of the informal sector, implementing a pilot project in Nicaragua to bring this sector into the formal economy; developing a pilot project for small rural companies, which will combine the development of the rural cooperative movement and the general development of cooperativism, properly speaking, as a social and productive system, to eliminate the middleman and bring the producer closer to the consumer; and implementing a programme for small and micro-enterprises.

These measures would improve the productive potential of Nicaragua, the welfare of the poorest groups, and the social organisation of producers in the informal and rural sectors.

This co-operation should be part of a consistent programme of vocational training, which is fundamental in any process of industrial conversion. We can no longer attract investment on the basis of cheap labour. The multinational corporations today want skilled labour. In other words, technological changes mean that we have to enhance the skills of our workers.

We agree with the Director-General and are convinced that states will not achieve lasting peaceful and democratic development if they cannot create productive and useful jobs.

In the light of this, we think that we should make every effort to ensure that our social development policy will give the market economy a human face, and minimise the social impact of stabilisation and structural adjustment measures. We believe that the IMF and the World Bank, together with the IADB and the ILO, should help us to apply a social policy with institutional support and finance. Political democracy cannot survive without genuine economic and social democracy and social justice. The exercise of democracy does not end at the polling booth.

In conclusion, I would like to express our agreement with the UNDP statement quoted in the Director-General's Report. "The basic objective of human development is to enlarge the range of people's choices to make development more democratic and participatory. These choices should include access to income and employment opportunities, education and health, and a clean and safe physical environment. Each individual should also have the opportunity to participate fully in community decisions and to enjoy human, economic and political freedoms."

Original – Russian: Mr. KASKEVITCH (Minister of Labour, Ukraine) – Permit me to begin by congratulating the President on his election to this high post and by wishing him and all the participants in this session success in their work. I should also like to express our gratitude to the Director-General, who has chosen the subject of democratisation and the ILO for his Report. This is a theme of great importance for all the countries of the world, including my own, Ukraine.

Slightly more than half a year ago, on 1 December 1991, the people of Ukraine confirmed a previously adopted parliamentary Act proclaiming the country's independence, by means of a referendum with over 90 per cent participation. An overwhelming majority voted in favour. By so doing, the Ukrainian people have expressed their aspiration to create a sovereign state based on the rule of law and principles of democracy and social justice, giving high priority to universal human values and respect for and the constant and scrupulous observance of the highest international standards of human rights and freedoms.

Now that it is independent, Ukraine has undertaken a comprehensive restructuring of its economy, dismantling the old command-from-above structure.

In a short space of time, we have created a basis for new legislation, aimed at introducing market relations, ensuring fair protection of all forms of property and implementing an independent economic policy and active participation in the international division of labour. Of course we understand very well that the implementation of radical economic reforms is a very lengthy and complicated process, requiring great efforts from all parts of our society. We therefor fully agree with the Director-General's statement that "the past cannot be wiped out by the wave of a magic wand". We understand, of course, that serious difficulties lie ahead (indeed some have already been encountered) but we are fully resolved to building a new society based on market relations and the strict observance of human rights.

In the legislative package already adopted or currently under consideration by our Parliament, high priority has been given to laws designed to guarantee the functioning of the labour market, to create an effective system of labour relations and to afford social protection to those who need it most.

A little over a year ago, the Ukrainian Employment Act was adopted. It is for me a source of satisfaction to speak from this rostrum to express our deep gratitude to the International Labour Office for its assistance in drafting this law and for its expert assessment both of it and of other drafts relating to collective agreements and to the settlement of collective labour disputes. In the future we will continue to turn to the Office for help in bringing our social and labour legislation in line with international standards.

We have recently developed a new conception of Ukrainian labour legislation which calls for radical changes in the structure and nature of our labour laws. These changes redirect the law towards the interests of the worker, bolstering the protection afforded by labour legislation and guaranteeing generally accepted basic human rights in the social and labour field. The Government will cease direct interference in the activities of employers, and will guarantee the worker's right to establish trade union associations according to their own choice.

The interests of workers will be protected by guaranteed minimum wages established by the State, and also by wage rates set by agreements at the national and sectoral levels, as well as at enterprises.

Special attention will be given to providing social guarantees to the most vulnerable population groups.

Guaranteeing cooperation between the executive branch of the government on the one hand and workers' and employers' organisations on the other will be an extremely important task. We will also extend the right of workers and employers to organise and hold collective bargaining and to conclude agreements on all questions relating to the regulation of work and rest schedules, occupational safety and other labour-related matters.

We understand full well that, as the Report emphasises, stable development cannot be attained if it is not based on the participation of all the interested parties. We now face the task of ensuring in the near future conscientious, genuinely representative and independent participation aimed at meeting the requirements of society as a whole. The process has already begun. Even before the adoption of the normative Acts I referred to earlier, tripartite employment commissions were created. In addition, employer training facilities have been set up, new trade union associations have been created and the old ones revamped, and relations have been established between them and government bodies.

In these conditions, Ukraine, like other countries undergoing profound social and economic changes, attaches special importance to the opportunity for technical cooperation with the ILO in order to set up a tripartite dialogue at all levels and to develop and strengthen our employers' and workers' organisations. They should be, as the Director-General says, capable of "listening to the other side and honestly seeking solutions that do justice to the interests of all".

To implement radical social and economic reforms in Ukraine and to overcome the economic crisis will require a tremendous moral effort and the combined and effective work of government, employers, workers and all the 52 million citizens of the country.

We will not repeat the errors of the past, and will not neglect the great opportunities to solve social and labour problems which the International Labour Organisation's rich experience has to offer. We will undoubtedly make use of this invaluable asset in our standard-setting and practical activities.

In concluding I should like to reaffirm the Ukrainian Government's desire to continue and further to develop its cooperation with the International Labour Office and its bodies as well as with all its interested member States.

Original – Russian: Mr. SHOKIN (Minister of Labour and Employment, Russian Federation) – Please allow me to congratulate the President on his election to this important and responsible post and wish him every success in carrying out his task in directing the work of this Session of the Conference.

The Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO submitted to us for discussion is extremely topical and shows the realism and the objectivity of the ILO's approach to this question.

The authors of this Report quite rightly point out that we are living in a time of "high hopes and also of great risks but we must take these risks and bet on success... nothing can be achieved... without effort".

We all know of the positive contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the attempts by the international community to assist the processes of democratisation which are going on in many countries, to promote social reforms and economic transformations, to protect workers' basic rights.

Now, more than ever before, international cooperation is required and we can all actively participate. Of course, it is precisely the ILO which could make a significant contribution to national programmes for social stabilisation where the painful transition to a market economy, is underway.

In Russia, at its present stage of development, international labour standards are becoming as one with the interests and tasks of democratic transformation of our country. We will all try to make sure that they will be used as a basis for the newly-emerging system of state and social democratic institutions. We also hope that these widely accepted standards will be observed by other countries including the newly independent States and we support the corresponding activities of the ILO to supervise the implementation of these standards.

In the Report it is quite rightly pointed out that democratisation is almost always accompanied by a change in the economic system without which it is impossible to improve the standard of living of our peoples.

Russia is not an exception to this rule. At the present time in Russia, we have come to the end of the interminable period of waiting for transformations, fruitless searches for a "third way". Today reforms have become a reality, reforms are taking place. They are beginning now to bear their first fruits. Obviously some inevitable negative aspects have emerged, linked with the heritage from the past and our own mistakes and errors. Step by step we are implementing a policy of radical economic reforms.

For the first time for many years, we have forced the economy to obey economic laws, we have brought to the fore financial and fiscal levers to regulate the economy, we are continuing the difficult but necessary process of liberalisation – of prices, foreign economic links and the mechanisms for the distribution of resources.

Our monetary and credit policy, all be it with great difficulty, is becoming the most important factor in business activities and motivating the labour force.

The Government is also carrying out an active industrial policy and is working out measures concerning structural reorganisation of the national economy.

We have put paid to the senseless expenditure on arms, although conversion also requires enormous investment and a great deal of time, and are making further efforts in order to maintain employment.

We have adopted a programme of privatisation; and are also going through the very complicated process of institutional change, freeing the economy from monopolistic control, and forming a competitive market environment.

International support for the policy of economic reforms being carried out by the Russian Government has become a reality.

We are currently shifting emphasis away from short-term targets to the implementation of a long-term strategy for the renewal of the Russian economy and its integration into the world economy.

The Government is just completing its programme for the next stages of economic reform for the remainder of this year and the next two years. We are now dealing with the problem of the social costs of the reforms we are carrying out. The Government is carrying out a dual task: on the one hand trying in the shortest possible period of time to achieve the final aim of our economic reform which is to provide for the functioning of a fully-fledged market, on the other hand, where possible trying to minimise the social costs incurred during the transitional period. To this end, we are implementing an incomes policy and a policy of social protection, labour relations and employment.

In general terms this policy boils down to the targeted support of the most vulnerable strata of the population, but we are trying to minimise the cost or the burden that this will have on the budget. This implies trying to reform the system of social security, including family and unemployment benefits, and trying to move to new insurance-based health care provision. We have taken decisions on support to be given to large families, military personnel and within the limits of our budget, we are trying to raise minimum pensions and wages.

The Government is also making every effort to compensate, as far as it can, for the inevitable drop in the standard of living, by simultaneously raising the level of wages and trying to prevent any spiralling hyper-inflation. The most important problem which we have begun to solve is that of employment. The main aim of Russian policy is to help ensure full, productive and freely chosen employment by creating a flexible labour market, raising labour motivation and expanding opportunities for all who are looking for work. The employment fund will be used not only in order to pay unemployment benefits but also to finance an active labour market policy including retraining programmes for the unemployed and encouraging enterprise.

In the very near future it is proposed that most powers to regulate labour relations be delegated to those directly involved, the workers and the employers, to encourage joint settlements through collective bargaining and the conclusion of agreements.

The Government is in favour of dialogue between workers and employers and is trying to provide for a system of social partnership. We are looking at the possibility of ratifying the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

In Russia we have also set up a tripartite commission to regulate social and labour relations. We have concluded a general agreement between the Government, trade unions and employers. On the basis of this agreement we have introduced sectoral agreements. I think, without exaggeration, that I can say that many social and labour conflicts have been defused because of the fact that compromises have been reached around a negotiating table in the context of these tripartite consultations.

These are only some of the problems which are facing our country which is on its way towards radical social and economic transformation.

Russia intends to continue actively to cooperate with the ILO and to draw upon its wealth of experience in solving problems of democratisation and developing the social sphere. We would like to thank the International Labour Office for the help they have already given us and we intend to develop our cooperation with the ILO in the area of standard setting, employment and training, labour inspection, the development of employers' and workers' organisations, and many other areas.

We also hope that the restructuring of the activities of the ILO and the reorganisation of the Secretariat, which we, in principle, support will be accompanied by suitable measures to staff the secretariat with highly skilled officials from all countries.

In conclusion, I would like to express my confidence that the Organisation is entering a new non-confrontational stage in its development and will be able to find worthy responses to the challenges of the age.

Mr. BHUIYAN (Minister for Labour and Manpower, Bangladesh) – I should like to offer my sincere congratulations to the President on his election. We are confident that under his able guidance the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will be a success.

The Director-General deserves thanks and appreciation for his excellent Report. I also wish to thank the secretariat for producing very good documents on the agenda items.

The renewed awareness of democracy has created a sense of political reawakening around the world. The adoption of "Democratisation and the ILO" as the main theme of our deliberations is both appropriate and timely.

As we are all aware, democracy is not just a system of organising governmental activities, it is indeed a philosophy of life. It is the most viable philosophy of social organisation. It is a way of life. In fact, the concept of democracy has to permeate all aspects of society if democracy is expected to succeed as a system of government.

The concept of democracy is all the more relevant in the context of ILO activities. The tripartite partners of the ILO need to do some soul-searching. Political democratisation of the system of government alone cannot be a full cure for all the participatory and transparency problems of a society. Economic democracy, industrial democracy and, more importantly, proper democratisation of the trade union movement would be some of the major steps towards the road to democracy.

The trade union movement, or at least a significant part of it, has for long been under the shadow of ideological confrontation and non-democratic leadership. The time has come for all trade unionists around the world to look forward to a genuine democratic process within the trade union movement itself. Being a trade unionist myself, during the best part of my political career, I can talk about the Bangladesh trade union movement with a degree of confidence. Our trade union leadership is now becoming increasingly democratically transparent.

Industrial management needs to be more democratic and participatory in nature. Harmony, balance and mutual respect between labour and management can be better secured under a more transparent and democratic management. Participation of workers in industrial management could be one way of democratising the management process. A sense of sharing and participation may bring about a better informed and more responsible partnership by the labour force. These ideas need to be further examined and refined to suit the needs of a particular society.

Democracy is not a static system for solving the problems of all societies. The concept of democracy has to grow with the political evolution of a society. But the fundamentals of democracy, like elected government and participatory management of industrial units or trade unions, are recognised and accepted universally. It is the form and not the substance of democracy that may be shaped by the historic experience of a given society. This dynamic concept of democracy deserves more attention and understanding.

We, in Bangladesh, have made significant steps towards the democratisation of our society. Since the ratification of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the Government of Bangladesh, under the leadership of the late President Zia-Ur-Rahman in the seventies, and currently under the leadership of Begum Khaleda Zia, has institutionalised tripartite management of industrial relations in the country. Democratic values and practices are taking root in our trade union movement and industrial management. The tripartite approach itself is a significant development towards democratisation of industrial relations.

Democracy does not come easy and cheap. The people of Bangladesh had to wage a relentless struggle for nine long years against an autocratic dictator. After many sacrifices, including that of precious lives, the people of Bangladesh have established democracy in the country. The Government of Begum Khaleda Zia has been voted to power in a free and fair election. Democracy is establishing institutional roots in Bangladesh.

The fragile sapling of democracy cannot survive, far less grow, in an environment of extreme poverty, hunger, illiteracy and disease. Social order and political stability are the first casualties in a situation of extreme deprivation and large-scale unemployment, even in a developed country with a long tradition of democracy.

I would like to invite the attention of our development partners and trading partners to this matter. To a hungry and desperate person, democracy is just another empty word. We must work together to combat hunger, the root cause of social anarchy. We need the continued support and cooperation of our development partners and trading partners in securing democratic traditions in our society.

Bangladeshi workers are working all over the world. Our workers have earned a good reputation for their discipline and hard work. Their basic interests, while they remain employed abroad, need to be defended by both the ILO and the respective host government. The phenomenon of migrant workers is securing special significance as the demand for migrant workers continues to increase around the world. We hope this area will attract more active attention from the ILO in the coming years.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JARWAN (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, United Arab Emirates) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Allow me to start by congratulating sincerely Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under his able leadership the work of our Conference will be crowned with success.

I am also very pleased on behalf of the delegation of the United Arab Emirates – and also on my own behalf – to welcome all the countries which recently joined the International Labour Organisation and are attending this Conference for the first time. We sincerely believe that their participation strengthens the universality of the Organisation and highlights the importance of joint international action.

This year the Director-General has chosen for the theme of his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. This choice is no doubt linked to the changes that have recently occurred throughout the world. We appreciate and understand the reasons for this choice. However, we feel that the concept of democracy requires a clear-cut definition and calls for a codified and straightforward practice. Indeed, human experience has proved the significance of democratic principles at all levels. None the less this experience has also brought home that there are many differences – and sometimes contradictions – in the interpretation of the principle of democracy and its application. It is therefore vital to go more deeply into and define this very important concept.

As regards the role of the International Labour Organisation, we are pleased to see the democratic approach outlined by the Director-General in his Report and hope that the concepts contained therein will be realised in all the fields of action and bodies of the Organisation – in accordance with the standards and principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution.

If democracy is an end itself – one of the objectives of our modern world, the realisation of noble values and principles and the expression of the respect of human dignity and human rights – then my country has an historic and noble past, stretching back over 14 centuries: its development has been based on equality, justice and tolerance which are the very principles of the teaching of our religion, Islam.

The values underpinning our democracy are those upon which, in this century, the concept of human rights has been based. But our experience has gone beyond the theoretical stage. We have established binding rules for the protection of animals, the preservation of forests and plants and the protection of the environment.

The constitution of the United Arab Emirates is based on these very concepts – the cornerstone of our faith, heritage and civilisation – and reflects the principles of one of the most democratic systems in the world.

Allow me briefly to take up a number of these principles as they are contained in our Constitution and in our national law and practice, under the aegus of His Royal Highness Sheik Zayed Ben Sultan Al-Nahyan, Head of State and Government, and his Royal Highness Sheik Maktoum Ben Rached Al-Maktoun, Vice-President and Prime Minister.

First, the Constitution upholds the principles of equality and justice for all, of equality and opportunity of equality of opportunity and of safety and well-being. It considers that solidarity and compassion are the very bases of human relations.

Second, as democracy is not a monopoly of the powerful, our Constitution affords particular protection to special social categories, such as children, mothers, young persons and those unable to fend for themselves because of sickness, old-age or unemployment. Indeed, society cares for these categories, provides them with training and helps them both materially and morally; a number of social laws have been promulgated in these areas.

Third, society considers work to be the main pillar of development and it is committed to providing work to its citizens by training them and establishing the necessary prerequisites; to this end, it has adopted legislation guaranteeing the rights of workers and interests of employers on the lines of the most sophisticated international labour legislation. Our Labour Code was also established on the basis of these principles.

Fourth, the Constitution enshrines the principle of the freedom of individuals to choose their job, occupation and employment. Work should not be imposed on anybody; and nobody should be reduced to slavery. My country has ratified the ILO Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Fifth, the Constitution stresses the importance of education as the cornerstone of progress in society. Primary education is compulsory and free at all levels in my country.

Sixth, society provides all citizens with health protection and means of medical prevention and treatment.

Seventh, the Constitution guarantees freedom of movement, residence and opinion and freedom of the press and speech. These freedoms may be witnessed in the mass media, in parliament, in private enterprises and social institutions. The Constitution also guarantees total freedom of correspondence in all forms without any restrictions.

The reason I wanted to mention these provisions in our Constitution is to demonstrate to you our commitment to make a contribution to human civilisation and world peace.

In the second part of his Report, the Director-General discusses the activities of the ILO in 1991. This Report describes many programmes and activities and we can only express our appreciation for the services provided by the ILO to its member States and to its commendable efforts in this area. I would also like to express our appreciation for the work carried out by the Regional Office for Arab States. We trust that it will continue its efforts within the framework of the ILO activities to consolidate the projects intended for the Arab countries. In this context, we should like to ask for an increase in funds earmarked for the Arab countries for technical cooperation projects under the Regular Budget of the Organisation and those financed by other sources of available funding. We stress the importance we attach to the transfer of the Office's activities to the Arab region.

Our International Labour Conference is taking place at a time when the world is faced with many problems and challences. It is undergoing radical change and we have grounds for hope that the many problems may be settled through dialogue. We should like in particular to stress once again our solidarity with the people of South Africa and trust that they will succeed in dismantling any form of racial discrimination and apartheid. We stand by them in their heroic struggle to establish a democratic society and attain independance.

We hoppe that the International Labour Organisation will be able to participate effectively, within its terms of reference, in all efforts made at the international level to establish peace based on justice throughout the world.

Since I am speaking of peace, allow me to add that this peace is being threatened in the Middle-East region. The national independence of our Lebanese brothers is being threatened by continuous Israeli raids.

Original – French: Mrs. CELESTIN SAUREL (Minister of Social Affairs, Haiti) – On behalf of the Haitian delegation of the legitimate Government of my country and on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President most sincerely on his election to the Chair of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I also bring you the sincere greetings from Jean-Bertrand Aristide, President of the Republic of Haiti. He sincerely hopes that this meeting will be crowned with success.

The Government which was elected after the first free election on 16 December 1990 made a number of basic choices; namely, justice, transparence and participation. These were the three basic elements of the project for our new society. The construction of participative democracy is the main challenge for us. The various inefficient structures had to be re-examined some would disappear completely and give way to new more appropriate structures while others would be revised and improved.

Our concerns are in line with issues which will be discussed here during the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. How can individuals become fulfilled if they do not carry out work which encourages them and enables them to improve and participate in their community? At the same time, how can a society be balanced if it does not offer the best and the same chances to all members on the basis of appropriate structures and appropriate organisations and just laws?

After his investiture on 7 February 1991, President Aristide called on the national and international communities. It was necessary to create the political and social conditions which would enable the economy to be relaunched through work in order to fight against underemployment, which is one of the crucial problems facing our country. To produce, and to produce better, is one of the chief aspirations of our Government. Investment and technical aid must be made available to all the various production sectors, and in particular farmers, factory workers and craftsmen and to the informal sector, which guarantees the survival of the masses.

Between January and September 1991 the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour held talks with Haitian workers whose aspirations are the same as those of all other enlightened workers throughout the world. We also listened to the employers' associations and became convinced that stability in production and the growth in wealth depend on the quality of labour relations and the application of just laws. We were sure of this fact and therefore we undertook the revision of the Labour Code which will be submitted for ratification by Parliament. The Act respecting minimum wages of daily workers, the subject of lively discussion in Parliament, and by employers' associations and different categories of workers has illustrated the passion with which social justice is being sought in Haitian society at present. But it has also demonstrated how this search can be in vain if certain basic conditions are not fulfilled and when the social services are virtually non-existent for the majority of citizens in a greedy State.

For the Government elected in December 1990, social security welfare is guided by the following basic principles: the coverage of all the different sectors of the population; the integration of social security measures in a national development programme; and the improvement of the standard of living of the population and overall economic growth.

Contacts were made for drawing up and implementing a social security policy which would respond to our needs and the multiple requirements of development.

Efforts were also made by the Haitian Government to deal with the injustice to which children, young people in difficulties, the handicapped, women, the unemployed and small farmers are subjected. The programme for job creation should enable us to meet some of the requirements of these different social categories. In addition, it was necessary to make room for the 20,000 Haitians and the children of Haitians all ages who had been expelled from the Dominican Republic by a Decree of 13 June 1991. The arbitration of the ILO was demanded and obtained by our Government in order to avoid a confrontation between these two peoples and to arrive at a just solution for both countries. On this occasion we would like once again to renew our thanks to the ILO.

A number of other projects concerning the labour sector were about to start up when the break took place. On 30 September 1991 we suffered the military coup d'état. The President, who had been democratically elected for five years was exiled; his Government was dismissed; and the people were massacred. For eight long months the Haitian people have been living through one of the most bloody and repressive periods of its history. Without mentioning the serious political consequences, I would emphasise the economic and social consequences such as: the disappearance or murder of 3,000 people, the muzzling of the independent press; the systematic repression of popular organisations; the dismantling of the trade unions and the closing down of the most subcontracting factories; the increase in the rate of unemployment; the degradation of the environment; the increase in the cost of living; the pillage of State coffers and the massive exodus of Haitians – 40,000 boat people in eight months; and, of course, the increase in poverty throughout the country.

The legitimate Government of Haiti would like political stability to be re-established in our country and be guaranteed by the return to constitutional order and, therefore, by the return to power of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide. This would enable Haiti to re-establish its links with the ILO.

I would like to stress here the importance for developing countries and thus for Haiti, to consider the social aspects of the policies of structural adjustment which are almost unavoidable today. We are particularly sensitive to the price which has to be paid in human terms for these policies. We are also concerned with the form of such adjustment and the way in which it can be managed in order to reduce budgetary deficits and correct the great social inequalities that exist.

Technical aid from the ILO has always been readily available and will certainly be requested by the Government once the democratic process has been re-established in Haiti. In particular we would wish for a strengthening of the available ILO structures in the Caribbean and in Haiti. With your co-operation and our determination to get our country out of the rut of poverty, our workers will be protected, small – and medium-size enterprises will flourish, human resources in trade and industry will be guaranteed, vocational training will be consiolidaded for workers' organisations and for trade unions, the problems of the deterioration of our environment will be reduced and women, "the other half of development", and their participation will be recognised in productivity, economic growth and the balance of the Haitian society.

I sincerely hope that the work of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will advance the cause of democracy in our world and particularly in countries which have an authoritarian tradition. That thanks to the action undertaken by the ILO, the planet Earth will one day be inhabited by happy men and women who are fulfilled by their work, freed from exploitation and under the banner of justice.

Original – Chinese: Mr. RUAN (Minister of Labour, China) – First of all, please allow me to extend my warm congratulations to the President of this session of the Conference. I would also like to congratulate the three Vice-Presidents on their election. I am confident that under their guidance, this session of the Conference will achieve fruitful results.

The present day world is in a period of transition from the old structure to a new one. The situation is ever more turbulent and volatile. It is a time of high hopes and also of great risks. Against such a background, the International Labour Organisation has an important task of work in areas where workers' interests are directly involved, areas such as employment promotion, income expansion, working conditions and social security.

The ultimate goal of democracy is to bring tangible results and benefits to the people. As is quoted from the UNDP Human Development Report 1991 by the Director-General in his Report, "the basic objective of human development is to enlarge the range of people's choices to make development more democratic and participatory. These choices should include access to income and employment opportunities, education and health, and a clean and safe physical environment." These observations are especially important for developing countries and those in the process of transition. China is a developing country in the process of reform. It attaches great importance to developing the economy and improving the living standards of its people and their conditions of social stability, while steadily promoting democracy on that basis. Since the founding of the new China in 1949, the Chinese Government has always taken as its most important and urgent task to provide its people with sufficent food and clothing. Since 1979 in particular, we have taken economic construction as the central task and carried out reforms which have further promoted the expansion of the social productive forces. Calculated in comparable prices, from 1952 to 1990, our national income had increased by 10.9 fold and our per capita consumption by 2.7

fold. We now support 22 per cent of the world's population with 7 per cent of the world's cultivated land. At the same time our achievements in education and medical care have also won the recognition of the world. By 1990 the number of our university, secondary and primary school students was 17.6, 40.3 and five times higher than in 1949. In the same period of time, the number of health institutions nationwide increased by 60 times. Now our people enjoy the right to subsistence with sufficient food and clothing. This is for China, a country with a huge population which used to suffer immensely under imperialist aggression and oppression, a historic achievement in its fight for independence, democracy and human rights.

The right to work is also a basic democratic right for citizens. China's Constitution provides that citizens have the right and obligation to work and that the Government should actively take measures to create employment. Soon after the founding of the new China, we succeeded in resettling 4.74 million people in cities and towns who had lost their jobs in the old China. Since the inception of reform we have tried to create employment in cities and towns by encouraging people to organise themselves in collective enterprises or seek self-employment, over and above the efforts made by the Government. For the surplus labour in rural areas, we have encouraged the development of township and village enterprises, so that farmers can find jobs near their homes. Since 1985, our unemployment rate has been kept at about 2.5 per cent, which is quite low compared with other countries.

I do not wish to dwell any longer on statistics to show China's achievements. What I want to point out is that in promoting democratisation, the ILO should emphasise that the process should not bring poverty or turmoil to its Members, nor should it impair the fundamental rights and interests of workers. As is pointed out by the Director-General in his Report, "there would be little point in introducing or restoring democratic values if doing so did not offer a cure for poverty, inequality and exploitation".

With regard to the ongoing democratisation process in the world, the consistent position of the Chinese Government is to respect the choices of the people of different countries. I agree with the Report of the Director-General that democracy is not a rigid ideology. Whether in developed or developing countries, democracy has never marked time at any stage. The concept of democracy is constantly enriched by various countries as time goes by. For over 150 years, the Chinese people have fought long and hard in pursuit of well-being and democratic rights. It was only under the Communist Party leadership that they found at long last the road of development suited to China's realities.

As we look back over Chinese history, and indeed that of all countries, it is not difficult to come to the conclusion that democracy develops from the evolving civilisation of all countries and cannot be monopolised by any single mode. If we take into account and make allowance for different perceptions of democracy under various political, economic and social systems as well as in countries of different historical, religious and cultural backgrounds, then it is likely that we can usher in a new international situation of mutual respect, mutual accommodation, harmony, cooperation and common progress towards democracy. If on the contrary, anyone should attempt to judge other countries against the criteria of a particular mode formed in given historical, social and economic conditions, or to impose its own mode on others, then conflicts may arise among countries with different social systems and cultural backgrounds, or the world may be taken to the brink of disaster. Clearly, we should opt for the first formula.

The Report of the Director-General suggests that in working for democracy and social justice, the ILO should play its role in encouraging tripartite cooperation within its member States, so that the market economy can be more effective. I believe that both planning and the market are means of distributing resources rather than criteria for distinguishing between social systems. In its economic development, China came to realise the drawbacks of the highly centralised command economy. So from 1979, it has strengthened the market mechanism. Over the past ten years or so, it has made great efforts to set up markets for consumer goods and for the means of production, as well as financial, technical and labour markets, which together comprise a complete socialist market system. At the same time, we have not given up planning as a means of macroeconomic control and regulation.

I want to point out in particular that the three major institutional reforms of labour, wage and social security, are important not only to developing the economy but to protecting the democratic rights of workers as well. For instance, by instituting a contract system for all employees of an enterprise, we can protect the legitimate rights of both employees and enterprise, on the basis of contract law; by adopting the distribution system of "to each according to his work", we allow some people to get rich first, and those who get rich should help those who have not done so that all will prosper. Finally, with the unemployment and pension system we can create conditions for fair competition among enterprises while effectively protecting the interests of workers.

These reforms in the field of labour call for closer cooperation between the Government, enterprises and trade unions in order to address the labour-related issues together. For example, under the 1987 Provisional Regulations on Labour Disputes in State-run Enterprises, both trade unions and enterprise leaders should participate in the labour dispute mediation committee of the enterprises, and local labour dispute arbitration organisations should involve the representatives of labour departments, enterprises and trade unions. China has already ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

In this respect, we hope to step up exchanges with the ILO and friendly countries, and learn from market economies all the good experience conducive to economic development.

Mr. NKOMO (Government delegate, Zimbabwe) – Allow me on behalf of the Zimbabwean delegation to congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their being elected unanimously to preside over this Conference. I wish to express our confidence in them as well as assure them of our optimum cooperation as they guide the proceedings of this Session of the Conference.

Turning to the business of the Conference, let me at the outset congratulate the Director-General and his staff for producing analytical, comprehensive and informative reports and other working documents which will no doubt greatly facilitate the work of this Session.

My delegation has examined the Director-General's Report focusing on ILO activities, with particular interest in those activities in Africa, including Zimbabwe. It is clear from the Report that the International Labour Office should be commended once again for embarking on very important programmes of action aimed at ameliorating the socio-economic conditions of our people. Zimbabwe has benefited immensely from ILO assistance, and I would like to express our deep appreciation of the ILO's efforts in accelerating our economic development, particularly through the provision of technical expertise for various programmes in training, labour administration, social security, rehabilitation and employment promotion.

At the regional level, ILO assistance has been greatly significant. The role of the African Regional Labour Administration Centre in developing expertise required by member States in the fields of labour relations, labour administration and factory inspection is also greatly appreciated. ARLAC has, for example, been able to offer useful courses on employment services and counselling, tripartitism and structural adjustment, factory inspection, labour standards, labour relations, labour administration and conciliation. Furthermore, in anticipation of a new political dispensation in South Africa, ARLAC has been providing training to labour experts from South African liberation movements and trade unionists. Through the years ARLAC and the ILO have developed a structured and positive partnership which has benefited English-speaking Africa. It is a superb and live relationship which we have to consolidate for mutual cooperation and advantage.

In the field of rehabilitation, the ILO has played a very significant role in the establishment of the African Rehabilitation Institute (ARI) in collaboration with the OAU. The ARI is therefore a monument of great hope to the handicapped, who have been hitherto regarded as second-class citizens. I am happy to announce that, having formally acceded to the ARI in 1986, and having agreed to host the ARI headquarters, Zimbabwe has subsequently signed the host agreement establishing ARI headquarters, which were officially inaugurated on 11 May 1988. The ARI has, therefore, an enormous task ahead, not only in southern Africa, but also in the whole of Africa, where an estimated 55 million people have a disability of one kind or another.

In the light of this, I wish to appeal to the ILO to consider reinstituting its contribution to the ARI budget.

I wish to commend the ILO for the excellent work it has done for disabled women – for the ILO's special project of disabled women. Through this programme, disabled women have acquired valuable skills in the development of cooperatives and industrial training to help them achieve self-sustenance.

The Southern African Team for Employment Promotion (SATEP) is yet another project in which the ILO has been providing us with technical assistance and advisory services. Since SATEP's establishment, the Team's activities have been centred on issues of income policy and employment creation, particularly in the non-formal sectors of our economy. With the ILO's tripartite structure, SATEP is able to cooperate with employers' and workers' organisations as well as government institutions in dealing with economic development issues, employment creation and human resources development in our region. My country also appreciates the ILO's extended role in training workers and employers in industrial relations.

The other ILO project based in Zimbabwe, Improve Your Business (IYB), has been providing technical assistance and training to small business people on how to start small businesses and on bookkeeping.

Let me now turn to the Director-General's Report, dealing with previous Sessions of the Conference at which most of the topics dealing with humanitarian issues featured prominently. Zimbabwe fully identifies itself with the substance and observations of the Report.

It is clear from the Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid that the negotiations currently taking place in South Africa should be encouraged in order to bring peace to South Africa and to the region as a whole. Zimbabwe's position reflects that of the Front-line States and the OAU Ad Hoc Committee on Southern Africa.

The steps taken so far by the South African authorities, whilst commendable, fall short of the full expectations of the majority of South Africans and the international community. Zimbabwe will therefore continue to give the necessary support to the unfolding political process.

In this regard, we hope that the decisions of the Tripartite Conference on Southern Africa, held in Harare from 5 to 8 May 1992, will be adopted at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference without reservations.

The 79th Session of the International Labour Conference has brought into sharp focus the ideals we strive for in terms of the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters and adjustment and human resources development.

My delegation fully supports the principles behind the proposed instrument on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. Therefore, any guidelines from the Conference on the measures that have the potential to protect our workers from the result of their employers' insolvency would enjoy our full support.

I note that the Conference is addressing, for the first time, the question of the prevention of industrial disasters, in the hope of coming up with an instrument. Industrial disasters worldwide are claiming many lives and causing environmental destruction. It is therefore my delegation's expectation that the proposed instrument on the prevention of industrial-disasters will give us further guidance in promoting occupational safety and health an environmental protection.

I now turn to the aspect of adjustment and human resources development, which no doubt is a major area of interest to most developing countries, where sweeping economic changes and wide-scale restructuring are taking place. A major priority here is the need to arrest the trend towards a reduction in expenditure on human resources development. We feel adequate education and training are essential elements in any structural adjustment policy.

There is no doubt that future failure to invest in the development of skills to underpin structural adjustment programmes could endanger chances of recovery and development prospects. It is therefore necessary that political decisions in the allocation of training resources are supportive of the reform programmes.

The daunting tasks that we face in the area of labour in my country cannot be viewed in isolation from the general economic environment. It is now common knowledge that the subregion as a whole is going through the ravages of an unprecedented drought. Nevertheless, I can assure you, Mr. President, that we remain committed to the democratisation of the labour scene. In this regard, I wish to express our appreciation for the continued support that the ILO has given us. We recently received a labour law expert in Zimbabwe to help us to harmonise our various labour laws. It is our hope that Zimbabwe will respond adequately to the imperatives that go with the process of democratisation and economic restructuring.

Finally, Mr. President, you can count on our full support and cooperation as you preside over the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original – French: Mr. GAYAMA (representative of the Organisation of African Unity) – The course of world history has suddenly gathered momentum recently and it is therefore offering us a considerable choice of subjects for discussion at this session of the Conference.

On its own, Africa could put forward a completely integrated agenda focusing on nearly all the major preoccupations of society today, such as those concerning employment and the physical, moral and material security of workers and their families, the conservation of the environment and sustainable development.

We would be right to ask ourselves about the present state of economic or political relations between peoples and nations because of a need for a climate of peace and justice, which would be able to sustain reforms that have been launched at the level of enterprises and national institutions.

Moreover, how could we fail to react to the ravages caused by so many natural disasters, drought in particular which is affecting whole regions in the Sahel, the Horn of Africa, and, more recently and in a fairly unexpected way, a large part of southern Africa?

The Organisation of African Unity welcomes the fact that such preoccupations are being taken into account here to highlight the common destiny of our planet and its inhabitants, at the same time as in Rio de Janeiro this destiny is being subjected to the most serious scrutiny.

In such circumstances, the task before the President in heading this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference is of particular importance. He is a personage whose political standing and competence are commensurate with the challenge. As he is assisted by other eminent Officers of the Conference I think we can conclude that all the necessary prerequisites exist for the success of this session of the Conference.

We appreciate very much the personality and the competence of Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, who recently visited us in Addis Ababa. We would once again like to state our confidence in him and pass on to him friendly greetings from Mr. Salim Ahmed Salim, the Secretary-General of the OAU.

During the course of the 27th Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Organisation for African Unity, held in Abuja, Nigeria last year, one of the most important decisions adopted by the Heads of State was the Declaration on the Employment Crisis in Africa. This demonstrated an acute awareness of the seriousness of the problem. Now, the problems of employment and unemployment, are to receive the priority worthy of them, all the more so since the economic integration of African envisaged by the Treaty Establishing the African Economic Community, signed on 3 June 1991, will probably be organised on the basis of a rational use of our human resources in conformity with the principle of popular participation in development, which was adopted in 1990 by African countries in Arusha.

The most vulnerable categories, such as women and young people, in urban as well as rural areas are paid particular attention here. In cooperation with UNICEF, for example, OAU is to organise (next November in Dakar) an international conference on assistance for African children, to enable them to have access to the benefits laid down in the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of Children.

The OAU Labour Commission has confirmed these arrangements by setting up a tripartite structure (State, employers and trade unions), which will promote a dynamic African policy in areas of labour and social affairs which bears witness to Africa's determination to promote the emergence, in society, of workers' organisations and other associations, whose contribution will be welcome in consolidating a democratic culture.

In a few days' time, in Dakar, Heads of State and Government of the OAU will look at these matters again when they proceed, during their next summit, to assessing the progress which has been made in African integration, in implementing the Declaration on the Employment Crisis in Africa, and when they finally adopt the conclusions of the last session of the OAU Labour Commission.

By emphasising this global approach and dealing with a number of situations which require urgent commitment, African countries see that it is necessary to depend, above all, on their own resources. The freeing of individual initiative, accompanied by an increased effort to promote regional cooperation, are, we cfeel, the minimum prerequisites for the success of democratic experiments since no democracy can be guaranteed in sharing poverty and the eradication of poverty constitutes a priority democratic duty.

From this point of view the exercise in structural adjustment does not guarantee a rosy future, given its prohibitive social cost in an international environment which tends to generate debt and is little inclined to give priority to the human dimension of development.

Since there are common interests and a common destiny due to the growing interdependence of the world there is surely no more appropriate parameter than that concerning the lives and the destinies of human beings.

This concern, quite naturally, led the OAU to focus in particular on the question of migrant African workers in Europe. These today are confronted by a wave of xenophobia and attitudes which impinge on their dignity. Students, trainees or workers of all categories sometimes suffer from a climate of hostility, be it latent or otherwise, which is also reflected in certain legal provisions which have been recently linked with the adoption of the Single European Act.

It is unfortunate to note that the liberation of countries of the former Eastern European communist bloc has only extended the network of anti-African discrimination as if it were felt urgent for some people in those countries to fall into step with those in the West who promote their nationalism by directing it basically against nationals of countries in the south.

Can we really believe that the construction of the common European home is based on exclusion and retrenchment. We hope that dialogue and concertation will prevail over chauvinism and a tendency to take unilateral decisions.

The situation in South Africa continues to concern us, even if the OAU has sympathy for the process of change which is taking place. However, this process has not yet reached its point of no return. To put it clearly, apartheid and racial discrimination cannot in any way be the basis of a legitimate policy, above all in the world of labour, where there should not be any subjective criterion linked to race.

Now southern Africa is forced to redirect its energy towards another unexpected battle – it is now being hit by a severe drought which is threatening more than 20 million people.

The Conference which was held here on 1 and 2 June under the aegis of the United Nations and SADCC has reassured the OAU in its efforts to mobilise and make the world aware of the seriousness of this problem. We feel that the drama which is taking place in these countries will soon be mitigated so that that subregion, which is usually self-sufficient, will be able to find its balance and harmony again.

When we know to what extent such calamities increase the flow of refugees and displaced persons, and Africa has the greatest number of these people in the world at the moment, we can see the scale of the tragedy.

The transformation of the world, which is taking place at present requires all our energy and our goodwill. International cooperation of the most active kind is required now, more than ever in the past.

We must put an end to certain paradoxes which justify hunger and malnutrition in a world which is capable of producing whatever is needed and which could satisfy the needs of the greatest number of people. Let us agree that one of the tasks of the tripartite bodies in the world of labour should be to propose innovative solutions which will be of benefit to all.

As it has been accepted that one of the most important challenges facing the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development is to assimilate all factors connected with the conservation of resources and their rational use. We are fully convinced that this session of the International Labour Conference will prepare, for its part, people's minds for the dawning of a new age where the human being will be the focal point of human activities.

I hope that this 79th Session will produce a plethora of proposals for meeting the expectations of Africa and the world, above all concerning the promotion of the essential values of peace, labour, justice and democracy.

Original – French: Mr. NDASINGWA (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Rwanda) – It is a great honour for me to take the floor at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference so as to offer to the International Labour Organisation and all its Members the warmest greetings of the Rwandese people and to share with all present our respective societies' current experience in the field of labour.

But before I continue I would like to express to the President, and to the Conference Officers, my warmest congratulations on their election. Your skill and human qualities are, I believe, a guarantee of the full success of our work. I assure you that the Rwandese delegation will cooperate fully with you in the accomplishment of your task.

The subject chosen this year by the Director-General of the International Labour Office is of the greatest relevancy. Democratisation and the ILO is a subject which concerns all of us since, as the Director-General indicates in his Report, the values of democracy are indeed universal; they prevail in the north, south, east and west. Rwanda fully endorses the very thorough and valuable analysis made by the Director-General in his Report to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Report demonstrates quite clearly the challenges facing genuine democratisation in our societies, and describes the main thrust of the ILO's contribution in dealing with these challenges.

Rwanda is no stranger to the surge of democracy. Together with the rest of the international community, the country is committed resolutely to building a society in which the Rwandan people's aspiration for freedom, justice and welfare is given the highest priority. In concrete terms, this has been reflected in sustained and remarkable efforts to reform our political, social and economic systems.

Politically, Rwanda has taken an important and promising step forward towards democratisation. The Constitution which was adopted in June 1991 ended the single-party system and endorsed political pluralism. Since then, several political parties have been registered and they are now conducting activities throughout the country. The current Government, in which I serve, includes ministers from the country's five largest political formations, and it is responsible for managing a transition leading to general, free and democratic elections. The Government is determined quickly to promote the principles of pluralist democracy and have them take root so as to create a political, economic and social environment conducive to a strong surge of development.

In the field of trade unions and trade union freedoms, independent depoliticised unions are now thriving.

However, economically speaking the picture is not so bright. Rwanda is plunged in an extremely serious economic crisis at the present time.

Rwanda is a small country – 26,338 square kilometres – located in the centre of Africa. At the time of its independence in 1962 it was among the three poorest countries in the world.

Since then, however, much effort has been made and the Rwandese economy made considerable progress until the beginning of the 1980s.

The economy expanded quickly, with an annual growth rate of the GDP of 6 per cent, or about double the average rate for sub-Saharan Africa.

Rwanda very rapidly developed its basic infrastructures, particularly in both domestic and foreign transport. The main roads were paved and airport and telecommunications infrastructures were set up. The welfare of the population was improved by enhancing health, education, water and energy services.

Budget deficits were relatively low and the relative level of exchange reserves was among the highest in Africa. The debt service ratio was less than a third of the average for sub-Saharan Africa.

The strong performance of the Rwandese economy, however, did not last. The economy still now faces serious constraints both owing to structural and temporary economic factors. I am not going to mention them all, but among the most important elements is the fact that our economy was concentrated on the export of one single basic commodity, coffee. It represented 75 per cent of exports. Other factors included a large population with high density and demographic growth, which consequently exerted excessive pressure on agricultural lands and the environment, worsening soil fertility and deterioration of the environment in general, deterioration of terms of trade (principally because of a collapse in world prices of our export commodities, coffee and tea), the collapse of the mining industry in 1985 (which represented 2 per cent of GDP, 14 per cent of regularly employed labourers and 37 per cent of total export income).

The combined negative effect of all these factors lowered economic growth to 1.4 per cent per year from 1982 to 1988. It impoverished the population, particularly the rural population, and led to financial imbalances both internally and externally, in spite of corrective action undertaken since 1982 by the Rwandese Government in the hope of restoring these balances and repriming growth.

In the light of this situation, the Rwandese Government, in cooperation with the IMF and the World Bank, adopted in October 1990 a structural adjustment programme so as to reprime economic growth, improve the external balances, tidy up and improve public finance.

Within this first programme then we are also envisaging a reform of the labour legislation in force after having studied all main questions pertaining to the labour market in Rwanda and after having proposed more reforms which will protect and promote the creation of jobs.

But all these efforts to reform, courageously undertaken in the areas of politics and economics, are compromised most seriously by a fratricidal and costly war which has been waged along the frontier with Uganda for the last two years. It is fratricidal because it was started by Rwandese refugees living in Uganda who are fighting against members of their own country. It is costly in terms of human lives, material goods, and the displacement of thousands of people who are living in conditions of great suffering and in desolation. It is costly above all because it bleeds our country dry and is now forced to invest a considerable portion of its limited resources in military expenditure to the detriment of vital investment in education and health.

The multi-party transitional Government set up last April has set itself the priority of negotiating a peace settlement, which is the prerequisite for the establishment of any proper democracy and a new economic upsurge. It has undertaken direct and frank negotiations with the Rwanda patriotic front, and the fist phase of these negotiations is under way as we speak, in Paris, and should lead to an effective cease-fire. The approach envisaged by the Government to solve this problem is to find an effective solution to the refugee problem. This problem can only be solved by guaranteeing all civil rights to refugees, in cooperation with neighbouring countries sheltering them, and offering them a free choice between voluntary repatriation, residence with full diplomatic protection in the country of exile, or naturalisation.

Rwanda hopes more than ever to be able to continue enjoying the support of the international community, in particular the ILO, in the process leading to a solution of these problems which are such a handicap for our development. Repatriation of refugees and demobilisation at the end of the war, which we sincerely hope for, will have a considerable impact upon infrastructure and on the management of human resources from all points of view, particularly in terms of job creation and vocational training. Through this international support, Rwanda will be able to reinforce its own efforts in the three areas stressed by the Director-General – to wit, respect for human rights, the implementation of a market economy with a human face, and tripartism as the model for participation.

Mr. JOHN (Workers' delegate, Trinidad and Tobago) – Let me join with the rest of my colleagues and the delegation from Trinidad and Tobago and the rest of the Caribbean in congratulating the President on being elected to the distinguished office of President of this session of the Conference. He knows that he has our support and that we wish him the best, not only in this position but to continue in the future.

First let me say that it is a great honour for me to be in a position to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. Coming from a small country of just over 1 million, as I do, it is very easy to yield to the suggestion that the world does not really care about what happens to us. Yet it is the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference that serves to remind countries like my own that, for as long as concepts like peace and justice continue to have meaning, men like us will be drawn together from countries of all sizes in brotherhood and solidarity and in the effort to make our world a better place in which to live.

For small countries like ours in the West Indies, conferences like these mean a lot because we are reminded that economic and social problems do not discriminate between countries. All our countries, big and small, are faced with one kind of problem or another. Problems of unemployment and poverty, problems of fiscal and external imbalance, problems of overwhelming debt burdens, these are all now a feature of life in nearly every country in the world.

For us in the Caribbean, we have had the painful experience of seeing our economic system shrink to dangerously low levels. We have seen uneemployment rise to double in the last ten years. We have seen employment levels fall drastically while income levels were being similarly reduced. The result has been an increase in crime and social tensions that threaten to destroy the very quality of life that we have always striven to obtain.

Moreover, we are seeing this at a time when conditions in the international economy are becoming more and more challenging with reduced capital flows to our part of the world, with world trade still steeped in extensive protectionism and with the conditions for obtaining finance becoming more and more demanding. We are witnessing unbelievable political changes taking place in Eastern Europe and in the former Soviet Union. Permit me to extend to the delegates of these countries a very special welcome to this year's session of the Conference. However, side by side with these progressive political changes, we continue to witness and experience an intense deterioration in the system of world trade and world finance. In this context of trade and finance, it would seem that there is something extremely illogical about the present set-up of international trade and financial arrangements, where it is daily becoming more difficult for countries to obtain foreign exchange through trade, while at the same time we are being asked to find more and more of this very foreign exchange to service the debts we owe.

The brutal fact is that, if most of the developing countries continue to be forced to pay the debts that have been accumulated, this will be the virtual end of any development, at least for this decade. What is more, if these countries are forced to adopt the stringent measures which the creditors regularly demand of us, in many cases we will see social upheavals on a scale never contemplated before. Yet we know that the international trading and financial system must be characterised by order, predictability and a high sense of responsibility on the part of all participants.

What then do we suggest? What would we like to see happen in the course of the next year or so? For our part we have no intention of asking for charity or even sympathy from the richer countries or from creditor institutions. However, if we allow the present protectionist trend and the mounting debt burden to continue to strangle middle and lower income countries of the world, these countries will soon lose the capacity to generate any surplus and therefore to repay the increasing debt.

Since such a development cannot be in the interest of the trade and financial system, we at this Conference want to send a clear message to the leaders of the countries and institutions involved that: (1) The Uruguay Round of trade negotiations aimed at lowering protectionist barriers should be concluded as soon as possible and, and (2) the time has come for meaningful debt relief to be afforded to the middle and lower income countries of the world. In the case of the debt problem, our Conference should make a strident call for the multilateral financial groups, together with the leading private lending groups, for example the Paris Club, to sit down with different groups of debtors and to arrive at a workable programme of debt write-off. Since the debtor countries will not expect to get this relief at no cost to themselves, the opportunity for a different type of conditions would be created. These would not be conditions that amounted to blackmail, or ones that threatened to destroy the fabric of our respective societies, but ones that would genuinely induce debtors to make productive use of any relief granted to them.

Let us not underestimate the significance of a conference of this nature. We literally represent the population of the world. We cannot meet here and simply exchange pleasantries as if life is bliss in our different countries. If we are to be honest with ourselves and with each other we would all admit to the threat now posed to our very existence by the present system of international trade and finance. A properly working economic system, or a properly working financial system is one that gives those who participate in it the opportunity to improve their quality of life by engaging in production, exchange and consumption. A properly working system would therefore lubricate the mechanisms of wealth creation and incorporate mechanism for an equitable distribution of income. Yet what do we find in the present system of international, economic and financial relations? We find a system dominated by the IMF and the World Bank – a system that has been making the vast majority of countries that participate in it poorer, a system that has become very good at generating more and more unemployment. In other words, the present international system is working in quite the opposite direction from what we know it should be doing.

I strongly believe that the time has come when the Director-General of the ILO should make his own inquiries into the terrible effects that the operations of institutions such as the IMF and the World Bank have been having on the countries of the world. I believe that the time has come when we must put a halt to the madness of increasing poverty and unemployment. Let us not have any doubt that the ILO possesses the moral authority to point our world in a new direction. For the ILO has always been in the forefront of finding ways of adjusting the problems of poverty, unemployment and income distribution in every corner of the world. To close our eyes to the present challenge would be to abdicate the responsibility of this great Organisation, the International Labour Organisation. To do less than meet the challenge head on would be to condemn ourselves and our children to chaos and confusion for decades to come.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. OLIVEIRA (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – I should first like to say here how extremely pleased I am at the election of Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues to preside over this 79th Session of the Conference,. He is a representative of Portugal which is our brother country in Europe and this means that our language will be spoken during this plenary. Soon perhaps our language will be spoken by more than 250 million people throughout the planet and perhaps even used in ILO pulications.

I should also like to say that this is the first time that Brazilian workers have freely been able to choose their representative for this annual meeting of the Conference. Thus, we have a union representative from the Workers' Central Organisation (CUT) which has existed since 1983 and he is here representing Brazilian workers following an agreement with the two other unions that exist – the Força Sindical and the General Confederation of Workers (CGT).

I would like to call the attention of the workers of all the world to the importance of the issues that will be dealt with in this meeting, and which include the prevention of industrial disasters – we all know very well what happened in Bhopal – the question of workers' claims in the case of insolvency of the employer and the question of human resources vis-à-vis the processes of structural readjustiment which are taking place throughout the world and in very different economic situations.

These are very important issues and I would not like to relegate any of them to second place. However, I would like to base my discussion chiefly on the consequences on the workers of the processes of structural readjustment, and the question of human resources and the disastrous effects of these processes for the population, particularly in such developing countries as Brazil.

We are paying an extremely high price for these readjustment processes which have favoured the interests of investment capital to the detriment of the standard of living of our population. These policies have been guided chiefly by monetarist policies of an ultra-liberal nature, and inspired by what is known as neo-liberalism the chief exponents of which were Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher. These policies have been applied indiscriminately throughout Third World countries when the developed world itself is already questioning their application. We see this frequently in the case of automobile quotas which are being constantly discussed between the United States and Japan.

The recent disturbances in Los Angeles have proved the effects of the social difficulties that exist in the most developed nation of the world, while the increase in misery, in hunger and criminality in urban centres shows that there is a very cruel side to this policy in the Third World. The attempts at coups d'état in Latin American countries which have unanimously been condemned by all workers throughout the world, bring us back once again to the Latin American situation and the military dictatorships which over the last years we have been trying to remove.

Our main concern is that the whole process of economic reform, the trend towards the free market that is taking place in Eastern European countries should not be merely a pretext or a justification for implementing savage capitalism. It is essential to give full weight to social questions in this whole process of economic and structural readjustment.

In this context, the training and retraining of workers to enable them to cope with these structural adjustments must be associated with the creation of new jobs. Otherwise, in spite of all our efforts, in spite of all the Ministries of Labour that exist, what we will have as a final result will merely be a very large number of qualified, skilled, unemployed people and this is of no interest to the workers and to the population of the world as a whole.

Along the same lines, it is also important to remember that workers and their organisations must participate actively and on an equal footing with governments and with employers' organisations in this process because only in this way will we be able to make qualitative steps forward towards true democracy which requires the representation and participation of all of us.

Original – Spanish: Mr. SOLORZANO MARTINEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Guatemala) – May I first express my congratulations to the President on his election. It is a great honour to be able to work with him as Vice-President in the management of this Conference.

Speaking for myself and on behalf of the Government of Guatemala, may I thank you for the honour you have conferred upon me by electing me to this office. For my country this honour is highly significant because of the fact that the people of Guatemala are engaged in a historical struggle to put behind us years of authoritarianism as we move towards democracy. To achieve our objective, we must conclude the domestic warfare which has plagued our country for the last 30 years, and rally international public opinion behind our efforts to secure peace.

I am therefore doubly satisfied to have been elected to the Vice-Presidency of this Conference, at which we are discussing the subject of democratisation and the role of the International Labour Organisation in that process.

For Guatemala, as for many of the countries in the developing world, the subject is current indeed since we have to deal with a heritage of violence, poverty and injustice. At the same time the world around us is living through the most transcendental changes of the century, with the conclusion of world polarisation, the globalisation of the economy, the emergence of new economic blocs in a context of free competition. We are therefore forced to undertake thorough changes in our own political thinking, in our economies and in our labour relations.

The Report presented by the Director-General gives us the opportunity to get into a very substantial discussion; in particular, it raises the issue of the steps which the Organisation must take as it moves towards the future. The first thing that I would like to stress is how timely this subject is. This reflects the ILO's concern for current problems, and the direction in which the Director-General would have the Organisation move.

In Latin America, as noted in the Report, we are dealing with a difficult contradiction. The process of democratisation has moved forward, peace is becoming a reality, and the spectre of authoritarianism and war is receding. However, the region has been very seriously buffeted, both economically and socially. Poverty rates are truly alarming. The informal sector of the economy is growing at suffocating pace and social indicators show a situation of despair.

The crisis means that we have to take specific adjustment measures to stabilise the economic and financial situation, but this leads to recession and strikes hardest at the poorest social groups, creating anxiety, despair and a feeling of ungovernability. This contradiction between the dream of democracy and economic realities has to be solved if really we wish to advance towards the achievement of freedom and social justice.

This is the challenge. We are pinning our hopes on the model of a global economy, free markets and free competition. However, we are weighed down by poverty, the need to overhaul the productive apparatus and labour relations, and to secure a more active participation of our citizens in the solution of existing problems. We also require an understanding of the developed world, a more productive dialogue between North and South, and technical and financial cooperation to jump-start our economic development.

It is very encouraging to see that the ILO has decided to "intensify its positive collaboration with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, so that the policies suggested to the member States should, as from the design stage, take into account the concerns of the Organisation, the government leaders responsible for social policy and the employers' and workers' organisations in the countries concerned."

This effort by the ILO is welcomed by all of us with great satisfaction; but at the same time, governments must be committed to buttress and support this policy.

This support must be expressed in the design and management of national economic and financial policies, in the sense that it is not possible to divorce economic policy from social policy.

May I expand on this idea by referring to a point I raised in Chile at the invitation of the Director-General.

Over the last few years, economic and financial activities have been implemented which have been at odds in many cases with the opinions of those who are responsible for social policies. The international financial organisations have been concerned with the problem of the fiscal deficit, with the need to drive down inflation, to ensure stable exchange rates, to improve currency reserves, and to ensure the payment of our external debts. But they have paid scant attention to the social situation, which demonstrates quite clearly that there is a lack of communication in these organisations with the ministries responsible for social affairs.

Further, the lack of participation and coordination between those who are responsible for the economy and those who are responsible for the implementation of social policies has generated serious problems in the implementation of structural ajustment policies.

I consider it very important that this Conference should look at the necessity of improving communication between these branches of government, to ensure consistency between economic and social policies.

My colleagues will agree that to be a good ministery of labour, economic and financial policies must be consistent with current realities.

But we must also recall the importance of social dialogue and the application of tripartism as the proper apparatus for building social consensus between the fundamental sectors of the economy and the State.

The practice of tripartism has made it possible to advance not only in terms of economic and social agreements, but, particularly in countries which have or have had to deal with domestic conflicts, in terms of the formulation of policies for social peace. This has helped to bolster dialogue and the search for consensus.

Our experience in Guatemala has demonstrated the advantages of this approach and we have been implementing it since last year in the so-called "Social Pact". We have continued this year with tripartite committees, composed of representatives of the private sector, labour and the State, to discuss improvement of labour relations and better relations within enterprises and within the country.

The success of this approach has led us to undertake a national consultation regarding on the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, No. 169 (1989), which, for the first time, has brought together the legitimate representatives of Mayan groups in the country to discuss openly whether to ratify this convention when it comes before the Congress.

In fact, tripartism has been promoted since the last meeting of Ministers of Labour for Central America and Panama. In all the meetings which we have had in the region, which are now attended also by the Governments of Belize and the Dominican Republic, we have invited employers and workers, as well as the international financial organisations, for a frank discussion of the problems facing us and of possible solutions.

Finally, I express my satisfaction on the ideas presented by the Director-General regarding the need to adapt to new situations. I would like to stress the importance of working with the Organisation to develop systematic activities in respect of democratisation, and the need to monitor the process throughout the next year, particularly in the field of tripartism.

This work requires a great effort in education for the three sectors, by means of courses, seminars and discussions, so as to raise awareness of how important and necessary it is. Only we put an end to confrontations and lay down the conditions for trust, will we be able to move towards our democratic destiny, the respect of human rights, and the necessary joining of forces to overcome our shortcomings in economic and social development.

May I express my own satisfaction and that of my Government for the topic and conduct of this 79th Session of the Conference. It marks a step forward in the development of our Organisation.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – We continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. STOCKDILL (Government delegate, New Zealand) – The New Zealand delegation at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference welcomes the President's election. Our Minister regrets that he is unable this year to maintain the tradition of ministerial attendance from our country, but he wishes the Conference well in its deliberations.

We also welcome the Director-General's analysis of the democratisation movement and of the ILO's place in that process. In the short time available here we wish to give our brief reaction to his questions: "What do we expect from the ILO in the coming years? How can be we all strive together for greater democracy and greater social justice?"

New Zealand does not pretend to have the instant solutions to achieving greater democracy and greater social justice. Nor can the ILO pretend to have all the answers.

But the ILO is particularly well placed, because of its tripartite nature and its extensive coverage, linked with its founding mandate, to contribute to those goals. The Director-General recognises that member and potential member States should be quick to support his efforts in more ways than simply by membership of the Organisation.

New Zealand believes that the answers to the Director-General's two questions are to be found within his Report.

What do we expect from the Organisation? We expect an Organisation that is able, through good management and structural positioning, to respond to the necessities of the moment. We expect flexibility and responsiveness. We expect efficiency and value for money. We expect an emphasis on action and achievement. We expect an Organisation that will not be daunted by the many challenges ahead.

The Director-General tells us – correctly, we believe – that "in order to discharge its functions correctly, the State must put its own house in order and prove itself a good administrator of public affairs". That assessment can, we believe, readily be applied to this Organisation as well as to its member States.

We believe that the Director-General is already facing that challenge in appropriate ways in a managerial sense, as he demonstrated in his paper to the February Session of the Governing Body as a basis for preliminary discussion of the 1994-95 budget. In particular, the importance he attaches to regional activities and the changes he proposes in order to emphasise those activities are welcomed by my Government. That concentration on regional activity will facilitate his suggested "active partnership" with member States and can only lead to a pratical contribution to social justice in those States.

A word of caution, however, and a word of exhortation. We cannot blithely expect the Director-General to achieve the goals we set for him unless we try to smooth his path.

The Governing Body has already established a working party to look at the annual Conference. Indications are that, subsequently, working parties will also look at the Governing Body itself and at our standard setting and monitoring apparatus.

New Zealand calls upon all member States, but in particular members of the Governing Body, to take a positive approach to those issues. If the Director-General is supported by the underlying and fundamental structures of our Organisation, rather than hampered by them, then he is better able to ensure that the ILO contributes positively and efficiently to the process of democratisation and to greater social justice.

The Organisation is happily placed in time in the sense that our efforts are not distracted to the same extent by political issues unrelated to our fundamental mission as an Organisation. That presents an opportunity for us to concentrate on doing what the Director-General describes as making our action "effective to the fullest possible extent".

Accordingly, New Zealand believes that if the ILO places emphasis on putting its own house in order then the benefits will flow in terms of an enhanced contribution to achieving the Organisation's objectives, in particular greater social justice.

We in New Zealand have no little experience of putting our own house in order in recent times. Our most recent efforts have been in reforming our labour market. The Government passed the Employment Contracts Act just over a year ago. Its purpose was to free the labour market by emphasising the freedom of choice both in relation to union membership and bargaining structures.

The Act relies on the contract law model ensuring that employment contracts are freely negotiated and cover only those employees and employers to agree to the contract. This contrasts with the previous system of documents negotiated by unions to cover whole occupations on a national basis. This is an unduly rigid system.

The Act has already stimulated considerable change – most significantly a change in bargaining structures. Although some industries have developed or maintained multi-employer contracts, most new contracts are enterprise-based. One effect has been the development of better direct employer-employee relationships as a result of the need to discuss new contracts directly with employees.

Many individual employers and employees have used enterprise agreements to address seriously the conditions of work in their own workplaces, free from the dictates of the old award system.

While the new legislative environment has opened the door to a wide range of possible arrangements, including arrangements in relation to the choise of bargaining agent, it is clear that unions are still playing a very active role on behalf of employees. A recent analysis shows, for example, that 79 per cent of employees covered by recently negotiated collective contracts were represented by trade unions.

The primary area of change in working conditions has been in the span of hours worked. This has been achieved in two ways: in general, while the 40-hour week has been maintained, core hours during which these hours may be worked have been extended. In addition, penal rates have sometimes been absorbed into higher weekly wage rates or have been reduced by agreement. Such changes have been particularly important in the retail and leisure sectors to enable firms to meet the demands of the increased Saturday and Sunday activity which has developed over recent years in New Zealand.

In some industries, wider flexibility changes have been made, such as the breakdown of demarcation lines which have bedevilled New Zealand manufacturers for years as a result of exclusive union coverage of occupational groups. Employees can now do a wider range of work, with benefits both in terms of efficiency and of job satisfaction and employee commitment.

Employees also now have greater and wider protection against unjustifiable employer actions. All New Zealand employees, regardless of whether they belong to a union and regardless of their level of job, can have access to a personnal grievance and dispute prodecure through specialist employment institutions.

With the abolition of exclusive union coverage, the Government has seen no logical role for the State-funded trade union education authority. It will be replaced, however, with an employment-related education fund which will disburse funds to provide the information and skills needed to develop effective workplace relationships.

In the equal employment opportunities area, the Government has established a joint private/public sector trust and a separate contestable fund to develop, promote and research equal employment opportunity policies and practices in the private sector.

Overall, the Government is pleased with the results of the reform programme.

The Employment Contracts Act is part of the Government's overall economic policy, which is aimed at creating the right environment for economic growth. The Act has provided a framework within which employers and workers can develop a direct and more cooperative relationship, allowing them to make ongoing adjustments to work conditions and organisation to meet ongoing changes, rather than addressing such needs in an annual round of claims and trade-offs. The kind of enterprise-based changes now being negotiated in many workplaces, which lead to more efficient and productive work practices, are encouraging examples of what can be achieved under the Act. The Act is already contributing significantly to the emerging economic recovery in New Zealand.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MATOUG (Secretary, People's General Committee for Vocational Training and Formation, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – Allow me, at the outset to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am absolutely confident that he will fulfil this task that has been entrusted in him to the best of his ability.

The Director-General's Report this year deals with a very important and sensitive issue which concerns the peoples of the world – an issue that is still the subject of regional and international conflicts and disputes. It is the question of democratisation in the world and the role of the International Labour Organisation. The Director-General wanted to raise this issue to be able to participate in the establishment of a real and direct democracy that will establish freedom, both for individuals and society – free from hegemony and colonialism.

The International Labour Organisation has always devoted its activity to far-reaching reforms which have occurred in the world. It has tried to find formulas to guarantee the respect of basic human rights and social justice.

This being so, the ILO must adjust to the changes in the world today and try to set right the adverse effects these changes have had on the fulfilment of his duties. We call upon it to attach greater importance to the principles of equality and justice within its own structure.

The people in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya enjoy true democracy through congresses and people's committees. They hold the reins of their destiny in their hands; they have thrown off the yoke of oppression, tyranny and deprivation imposed during years of hegemony and colonialism. They do not need to be governed in their everyday life. They already look forward to the day when all other peoples, following their example, manage to free themselves from the grips of their oppressors and outmoded political systems – when systems only have to answer to the wishes and aspirations of their people.

The Great Revolution of 1 September is doing all it can to lay the foundations of freedom and democracy. The people's congresses promulgated the Great Charter of human rights in this era of mass culture. In order to fulfil the glorious principles of this historic Charter, the basic People's Congress adopted Act No. 20 of 1991 which reinforces the cause of freedom, particularly in the areas of labour and employment and freedom of association. Its provisions stipulate that all citizens have the right to express their opinions and voice them freely in the basic Peoples' Congress and the press. Furthermore, citizens may set up trade unions, federations and occupational associations without restrictions and join them to protect their interests. Workers also have a right to choose their own work which is best suited to their capabilities, either alone or in cooperation with others – and to benefit from the fruits of their labour.

Under this law, women also have the right to do work that best suits them and must not be asked to undertake any work that does not correspond to their nature.

The role of the International Organisation today is clearer than ever before. It has to reinforce just social values, establish the bases of social dialogue, consolidate equality and the rights of producers, attempt to involve individuals in collective decisions, provide basic and essential services for the most vulnerable groups of the population, strive for collective bargaining, promote more far-reaching social reform, protect workers from all types of oppression and arbitrary measures to which they are subjected throughout the world – and, I regret to say, at the hands of international organisations which should be just and democratic.

Within the framework of the ceaseless efforts it is undertaking to raise the efficiency of national manpower, the Revolution of the 1st September has already set up a people's secretariat to formulate plans and intensive vocational training programmes in accordance with regulations in this sector. It is also being asked to do everything it can to promote vocational training establishments. In this way, it will contribute towards creating a skilled national manpower and persons – both inventive and productive – capable of adjusting to developments in the field of science and technology.

Training centres have been established for this purpose, distributed as follows: 106 centres provide basic training and should receive 18,677 trainees in 1992; 114 intermediate training centres with 45,096 trainees in 1992; and 11 advanced training centres with 5,000 trainees in 1992.

These centres provide training in various trades and occupations. There is also an annual training programme ro raise the skills of all workers. Forty thousand trainees have already benefited from this programme in 1992, and this has helped increase national manpower, from a total of 38,305 in 1990 to 90,107 in 1992, i.e. an increase of 40.1 per cent.

The great Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has adopted a very wise policy in the field of occupational safety in all plants to prevent industrial disasters and to limit the consequences of such disasters.

The people's councils of the Jamahiriya promulgated Act No. 93 of 1976 concerning workers' safety. This legislation, one of the most recent in this sphere, emphasises the importance of industrial safety at the workplace and establishes measures which employers must take to protect their workers. The Act requires employers to pay the cost of the training of workers in occupational safety and health and provides for the establishment of a workers' safety council responsible for preparing a general policy to guarantee the safety and health of workers employed in industry.

This Act clearly defines the role of the inspectors responsible for guaranteeing occupational safety and health and establishes sanctions in the event of infractions. The People's General Committee responsible for vocational training has set up a centre which provides advanced training in the sphere of occupational safety and includes various sections the role of which is to train executive staff specialised in all spheres of occupational safety and health and without which there would be no production, progress or prosperity.

The air embargo against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has caused much prejudice to all persons who work with the Libyan airline, as well as hotels, tourism, the public transport system and the airports. The embargo has also proved harmful to non-Libyan workers, who total more than a million and a half, and who must use their savings to go to the nearest country to be able to continue the journey home by air. Mention should also be made of those who are sick who must travel abroad for treatment and who die before reaching one of the airports in the neighbouring countries, as well as the thousands of Arab children who suffer from the difficulties we have in obtaining certain kinds of medicines and vaccines imported by air.

In the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, we hope that the international community will take a stand against this air embargo and that it will support the workers in our country, whether they be Arab Libyans, Arab non-Libyans or foreigners in general. The Libyan people and workers condemn without reservation terrorism in all its forms and demand the application of law, and not the law of the strongest, to resolve the problems and difficulties which affect countries. The settlement of these differences should be achieved without jeopardising national sovereignty and without interference in the internal affairs of countries, two aspects which are fundamental to the establishment of peace and fraternity between peoples.

Mr. WHANG (Employers' delegate, Republic of Korea) – It is a great honour and a pleasure for me to have this opportunity to comment, on behalf of Korean employers, on the Director-General's Report.

Before making my observations on the Report, I would like to extend my heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of this session. We are all convinced that under his distinguished leadership this Conference will be very productive and will bear fruitful results.

When the East-West confrontation was at its climax, the ILO was, for that period of time, a place where different ideologies confronted one another.

Fortunately the ILO is no longer the scene of ideological clashes, thanks to the recent rapprochment between East and West and the universal movement towards democracy.

Thus, the ILO is now able to organise and utilise the wisdom of the people of the world in order to materialise permanent world peace as found in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

At this historic moment of transition, we Koreans believe that it is very significant that the Republic of Korea has been admitted as a full Member of the ILO. The members of the Korean delegation now have the opportunity to discuss common issues and share mutual experiences with you. This gives every one of us the chance to find solutions that are acceptable to all.

Now, with just a few years remaining in this century, the world is rapidly tending towards democratisation in the political aspect, a borderless economy from the economic point of view, and the overall deregulation of administrative matters. In this context, it is timely and appropriate that the Director-General submitted to this session his Report on Demo- cratisation and the ILO. In that excellent and closely reasoned Report, the Director-General asks us what would be the most useful role that the ILO could play in fostering this democratisation process, in order to better help those countries that are undergoing changes away from an authoritarian system of government.

The ILO, long before submitting its Report Democratisation and the ILO to this session of the International Labour Conference, paid great attention to the process of democratisation, and generally led the way. Its unstinting efforts have indeed borne ample fruit.

We can all recognise and appreciate the fact that the ILO has made monumental efforts for the protection of fundamental human rights, including freedom of association, the elimination of poverty, and the safeguarding of mankind from the scourge of unemployment. For this, I would like to felicitate the ILO on these very noteworthy accomplishments.

It goes without saying that democracy, as properly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, needs political institutions such as parliaments that have been freely and directly elected by the people, and also needs guarantees of freedom of opinion and expression, social justice, fairness in the application and execution of the law, and the people's participation in the political decision-making process.

In addition, many other important conditions are needed for the implementation of the democratisation process. I would like to place emphasis on the fact that though the above conditions are indispensable for democratisation, they alone are not sufficient.

It is now common knowledge that even the authoritarian regimes in fact included statutes in the constitutions of their countries that, on paper, would appear to satisfy fundamental human rights. These provisions have often seemed to guarantee the basic principles of democracy and appear to acknowledge parliamentary institutions as the primary policy-making apparatus.

However, notwithstanding the above legal framework, the authoritarian regimes did not embody true democracy and the people living under those regimes did not in fact enjoy the liberties and freedoms stipulated in their constitutions and laws. In other words, the real situation is that although the liberties and freedoms stipulated in the legal framework may appear to be splendid, the body of law would be no more than an empty shell if the people were not actually able to exercise their given rights.

There is another facet to this situation. If the people have not been able to benefit from an appropriate level of education, and if they do not have a sufficient amount of economic power as best shown by their level of income, they cannot in effect actually exercise the liberties and the freedoms guaranteed by the constitution and laws of their country.

If this analysis is correct, it leads us to believe that the best way for the ILO to help its member States undertake the process of democratisation is to assist them elevate their capacity to acually allow the people to exercise their guaranteed liberties, rather than to press them to formulate additional measures within the existing legal framework.

Following on from this conclusion, I would like to suggest that the ILO give high priority to carrying out the following projects: first, the ILO should make every effort to see that advanced technology is introduced into the countries that are in need of it; second, the ILO should assist the activities of its member States in their quest for productivity improvements; third, the ILO should offer assistance in helping to develop human resources capital as well as occupational training in developing countries.

It is certain that the ILO, through fostering these kinds of technical assistance projects, will be able to provide tremendous amounts of help to the countries in the democratisation process which are virtually waging a war against poverty and unemployment.

I firmly believe that the ILO has the moral obligation to promote these kinds of activities. By adopting these measures and by accelerating the democratisation process the ILO will best be able to help the developing countries win the war on poverty.

I would like to conclude my comments by paraphrasing, the Director-General: genuine political democracy has little chance to survive unless the problems of unemployment and poverty are tackled and solved. Indeed, a prerequisite for democracy is a decent income and education for the people. And once established, democracy must not be taken for granted.

Original – Farsi: Mr. KAMALI (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

At the outset, I wish to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues upon his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am also pleased to welcome the newly independent countries as members of the ILO, and I hope that our ranks wich continue to grow as other republics join our Organisation.

Turning to the Director-General's Report, I shall speak of democratisation, employment, structural adjustment, tripartism and technical cooperation.

In our view, which is rootted in Islamic values, all human beings are created free and equal, and remain so in their work and life.

Democracy, in its general sense, can be explained in its individual, social and universal dimensions from the same point of view. But democracy cannot be achieved without social justice, both at the national and the international levels.

Given the interrelationship between national development and international development, action in the latter field can be effective only if the international system, and the programmes of action of the international organisations, in general, and those of the ILO, in particular, truly take into account the culture and beliefs of peoples.

Democracy, within the context of international relations, is possible, provided that the fruit of the labour of the millions of workers in the developing and Third World countries is shared equitably with these people, and provided that they are allowed to enjoy the benefits of the progress achieved in the industrialised North, whose development has been made possible by the unjust exploitation of the resources of other countries, to the detriment of their wealth and natural resources, and at the cost of the destruction of their environment. The only alternative is the law of the jungle to which the Director-General has refered.

It is a must, indeed, for international organisations such as the ILO to move continuously to enhance their dynamism. I agree that there is reason, in the light of existing conditions and worldwide developments, to reassess the International Labour Organisation and its advantages and disadvantages. This, in itself, indicates that the Organisation has not been able to meet fully the new needs resulting from recent economic, political and social developments in its member States. Hence, the need to review its structures and those of its constituents.

If the international organisations, and the ILO in particular, are to review their internal structures, the process must aim at justice and equity if we are to reach the objective of democracy.

Success in structural adjustment and the curtailment of its inflationary side-effects can only be guaranteed through a realistic assessment of all socio-economic aspects and the issue of manpower development, particularly as regards the promotion of technical and managerial skills in the developing countries.

In this connection, the role of the ILO can be highly effective. Therefore, the ILO should focus its attention all the more on the promotion of technical and vocational training, and on the expansion of technical cooperation. In the meantime, it is necessary to prevent the negative repercussions of structural adjustment by ensuring that technical and vocational training are geared towards the mobility of labour so that workers who are unemployed can easily find jobs in similar occupations.

Obviously, the level of development in the member States must be taken into consideration. In our opinion, investing in the promotion of small enterprises, where the basic needs of society are usually met, can help to create employment.

As regards tripartism it can provide a mechanism for the promotion of constructive dialogue among the social partners in the fight against the negative effects of economic and social adjustments. In this connection, our country has always heeded and applied this principle in the areas of occupational safety and health, social security and industrial relations, not to mention the settlement of disputes between workers and employers. In addition, the social partners have played effective roles in a tripartite framework in the proposal and formulation stages of the new Labour Code, which has recently come into force.

In our view this policy has helped to promote economic and social policies in the area of working conditions and labour relations.

The Government of the Islamic Republic of Iran has vast experience in the restructuring of its economy and has created considerable employment, and significantly boosted national production to the benefit of its citizens, despite heavy damages inflicted upon the country as a result of eight years of war. For example, the unemployment rate has been reduced by 3 per cent during the past three years; in addition to effective measures that have been taken towards the realisation of social justice through the implementation of the new Labour Code, the Government has adopted the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Early Retirement Act.

In conclusion, I deem it appropriate to draw the attention of the distinguished delegates to the fate of the defenceless Muslin populations in occupied Palestine, Bosnia-Hercegovina and elsewhere. I also wish to mention the recent bombardment of southern Lebanon by the regime of occupation. I hope that today, when the question of democracy is on the agenda of international forums, the conscience of humanity will awaken and rise against those outright breaches of human rights and attacks an democracy.

Hoping for the victory of the oppressed over the oppressors, I wish you peace.

Original – Russian: Mr. KOLMOGOROV (Employers' delegate, Russian Federation) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in his work, and greet the delegates to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the Russian Alliance of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs and the employers' organisations represented in the Russian tripartite Commission for regulating social and labour relations.

The theme of this session, Democratisation and the ILO, is extremely topical for Russia because of the radical reorganisation of the economic system and the system of labour relations.

I would particularly like to emphasise the part of the Director-General's Report where he mentions the help given by the ILO to the democratic transformations in countries undergoing reform, to help create the necessary conditions for the processes of democratic development to become irreversible.

In this connection, I think it is necessary to point out that one should take account, not only of the specificities of social, political and economic development, but also the social and psychological characteristics and mentality of a nation and its basic social forces. If this is overlooked, many constructive initiatives may never get off the ground.

I should point out that entrepreneurship in Russia (as a phenomenon) is being revived and, in terms of a social strata, is just beginning to take shape. The state sector prevails. However, the so-called free sector of the economy – the private sector, is taking off especially with regard to small businesses.

Sociological research has shown that 20-30 per cent of the active population of Russia, would like to have their own business. Among young people, under 25, the percentage was even higher, standing at almost 50 per cent. Overall, those in the free sector account for about 20 million people.

The economic ideology of most of our entrepreneurs aims primarily at achieving productive efficiency, developing private initiative, the possibility of further social differentitation, and an electoral system of social guarantees. This is all proof of the profoundly radical nature of Russian entrepreneurs.

In Russia, political events have gone far beyond economic developments leaving the solution of social problems far behind.

It is necessary to solve simultaneously a wide range of problems, including those of social partnership during the prolonged slump in production, a fall in standards of living and growing unemployment. In addition the process of setting up employers' and workers' organisations in which they can work together as partners is still not complete – the State has not let go of all the functions that they must have in a free economy. The privatisation of enterprises is proceeding slowly. Entrepreneurs, as a group have still not received legislative backing for their rights and powers or guarantees of their group activity.

Therefore, it is extremely necessary to balance the interests of both employers and employees and guarantee social partnership, which is so necessary at the moment in the interests of social peace.

In a system of social partnership we see both guarantees of democratisation at all levels of social and labour relations, and guarantees that the rights of property owners, producers and employers will be observed. In Russia, for the first time ever, a tripartite commission has been set up and a general agreement has been concluded for 1992 between the Government of the Russian Federation, Russian entrepreneurs (employers) and trade union organisations.

It has been agreed that the Government will take into account the opinion of the tripartite commission when drafting price and fiscal policy, and economic policy in general.

In this connection the help of the ILO and consultations are extremely valuable. Here I would like to express our gratitude to the International Labour Office for holding a seminar in Moscow for organisations of industrialists and entrepreneurs of Russia in April of this year. It included the participation of representatives from Ukraine and Belarus, and adressed the topic of the activities of employers' organistions in a market economy. A most active part was played in organising and running this seminar by Mr. Hammar and Mr. Karpatis and a number of leading experts of the ILO.

This Moscow seminar reached the conclusion that the ILO's activities require some adjustments which are also mentioned in the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne. First of all, standard-setting work should be combined actively with technical assistance. But in our view, of no less importance is the practical work of selecting, compiling and distributing the most valuable experience of employers' organisations regarding solutions to the problems of social partnership not only at the macro-level, but also at the micro-level, that is, in enterprises and also in their regional context.

For example, there is not a single model automatically appropriate to Russia because of its sheer size and the specific way in which it has developed.

However, the diversity of experience in solving various problems in labour relations will play a priceless role in selecting correct solutions. I think this applies not just to Russia.

The closer the ILO's activities are to the processes of transition taking place in many of the States which were formerly republics of the USSR, the greater its influence will be. However, one should bear in mind the possibility of working not only with each of them separately as Members of the ILO, but also through a regional structure such as the International Congress of Industrialists and Employers. This organisation was set up in February of this year as a unified symbol of the inevitability of integration, bringing together organisations of industrialists and entrepreneurs not only of the member States of the CIS but of all the former republics of the USSR.

Direct participation in the Russian economy by foreign employers is extremely important for the development of democracy in Russia and for the acquisition of experience in worldwide market relations. Among Russian entrepreneurs, more than half (51 per cent) think that the best possible conditions for attracting foreign capital should be provided, notwithstanding their fear of strong competition.

The degree to which investment is protected, including foreign investment, is one of the main concerns of the employers' organisations. Russia is attempting to join the world community using generally accepted civilised methods of work and procedures to come to agreements. The development of worldwide business links is in practice the main method of transmitting the wealth of experience. In order to achieve its aims, the Russian Alliance of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs is depending on constant contacts, frank consultations, and broad interaction with the ILO, the International Organisation of Employers, and all interested organisations of any country.

For our part, we will participate actively in all ILO meetings and will do what is necessary to increase the Organisation's prestige and influence, in accordance with its high vocation for the betterment of manking.

Original – French: Mr. ZIARI (Minister of Labour, Algeria) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President and the other officers on their election to high office at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am convinced that under their enlightened leadership our work will be crowned with success.

My congratulations are also addressed to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, for the quality of the Report which he has devoted to democratisation and the role which the ILO is called upon to play in linking this process to economic development and social justice.

Although it is true that democracy fulfils the aspirations of peoples for liberty and constitutes a strong rampart against all forms of political totalitarianism, it is still a fact that it cannot be achieved in all its fullness if it is not rooted in the culture of peoples, if it is reduced to its purely political and parliamentary dimensions, and if it does not bring hope, economic progress and social benefits to the population at large.

As the Report rightly stresses, the concept of democracy would be distorted if it were not indissolubly linked with equality and social justice. And it is true that "the aspiration for a free society has not eclipsed the desire for a just society."

This ideal of freedom and justice which democracy represents for nations should not, however, be restricted within the frontiers of States.

In a world which has today been freed from the antagonism of the Superpowers, the same ideal of democracy should also be the basis of relations between States, and particularly between industrialised States and those of the Third World, who today are still plagued by injustice and inequality.

To maintain the rules of an international order whose only objective is to perpetuate the dependence of the developing countries on the wealthier countries is to perpetuate the fragility of the very concept of democracy for that part of humanity which, on the eve of the twenty-first century, looks to the future and sees nothing but bleakness.

In this sense the International Labour Organisation must make an even effort than in the past to raise awareness of the need for a reform of rules which govern relations between North and South, so that democracy will have the same meaning for all peoples.

In Algeria political pluralism, freedom of association and the right to organise, the freedom of the press, as well as all other individual and collective freedoms, are guaranteed by the Constitution, which organises the institutional system within the framework of a separation of legislative, executive and judicial powers and provides full independence to justice.

This constitutional reform was accompanied by an economic reform aimed at a restructuring of the economy within the framework of a transition towards a market economy.

The economic difficulties which Algeria faces do not in any way diminish the will of its Government to continue to base its action on the respect of democratic rules combining the respect of fundamental human rights, economic development and social justice.

Thus, freedom of association, which is enshrined in the Constitution, is reflected in trade union pluralism in accordance with the will of workers and employers, in the recongnition of the right to strike, as well as in the implementation of tripartism to discuss the orientation of the Government's economic and social policies, with the participation of workers and employers from the public and private sectors.

As the Director-General has stressed in his Report, "no political regime and no economic system can expect to endure unless it is capable of satisfying the basic needs of its population".

Therefore, democracy can only have a mobilising effect if efforts are undertaken at the same time to respond to the aspirations of the population for greater well-being.

The roots of democracy in national culture are only weakened by the economic difficulties which the countries of the South, including Algeria, face and which make it impossible for them to restart their economies.

The fragility of the rules of democracy is all the more real in that their introduction is sometimes revolutionary with respect to the earlier socio-political system, and in that the aggravation of economic difficulties can be used by forces whose interests are threatened by the prospects of greater democracy.

This fragility will continue to exist so long as democracy is not achieved in all its dimensions and is not anchored in the daily lives of men and women in every country, especially since democratic freedoms can be used by reactionary forces to advocate a return to authoritarianism and a single party.

Such a situation, which is aided by the difficulties which the population confronts as a consequence of the economic crisis, is a reality which has to be taken into account.

In Algeria the suspension of the electoral process and the installation of the state of emergency, which will expire at the end of the year, were motivated by a desire to safeguard the future of democracy and, furthermore, to ensure the security of persons and property in a situation characterised by the need to restore the authority of the State and enable it to face destabilising actions which targeted republican institutions.

This motivation explains why, in spite of the exceptional situation which exists in Algeria, individual and collective freedoms have been fully preserved, including the activities of political parties, freedom of the press, freedom of association and the right to strike.

Faithful to its traditions, the ILO has not failed to place on the agenda of the present session of the International Labour Conference questions which are all fully in line with the noble concerns of our Organisation, on subjects which are directly related with the problems raised by the profound and rapid changes in the economies of all countries.

The adoption of Conventions and Recommendations aimed at protecting the rights of the workers in the event of the insolvability of their employer, as well as the need to safeguard employment during times of economic restructuring and the prevention of industrial disasters, reflects the ideals of the ILO, namely, to promote man and his fundamental rights.

On this last point, and because policies transcend the frontiers of States, the prevention of industrial disasters is of interest today to all countries, including of the Third World, many of whose problems result from the policy of industrialised countries of relocating their polluting industries.

The fact that this question is on the agenda of our Conference, as well as the holding of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, are important steps in raising the awareness of States as to the imperious need of working together to check industrial pollution which, whether in the short, medium or long term, threatens humanity with catastrophe.

The Algerian delegation will certainly contribute to this question, and to the other items on the agenda.

The advance of democracy in all parts of the world must not hide the suffering endured by people who, on the eve of the third millenium, are still fighting for their right to a free and decent life, particularly in South Africa and in occupied Palestine. It is also through its contribution to the success of the fight for fundamental human rights, the respect of the will of the people and equality among States that the ILO will attain the noble ideals laid down in its Constitution.

Original – French: Mr. OYONO ABA'A (Minister of Labour, Human Resources and Vocational Training, Gabon) – On behalf of the Republic of Gabon and the delegation that it is my honour to head at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, may I associate myself with those who have spoken before me and congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodigues sincerely on his election as President of this session.

I am convinced that under his guidance the work of the Conference will be successful thanks to his experience and deep knowledge of the International Labour Organisation. My congratulations also go to the other Officers of the Conference. You may all count upon the full cooperation of the Gabonese delegation.

The theme developed by the Director-General in his Report this year, which is of great relevance, corresponds perfectly to the concerns of the present time of most – if not all – of the member States of the ILO.

In fact the democratisation movement constitutes today the sign of a profound change taking place in many countries, both in the North and in the South. For the ILO and for other international organisations, whose principles of peace, freedom and social justice have always prevailed, this movement gives, I am sure, real grounds for satisfaction.

The present situation in Gabon, like that in other African countries affected by movements of democratisation, demands the introduction of new rules and institutions in the world of work in general and in the enterprise in particular.

It requires not only political leaders but also employers and workers to make an effort to change their mentalities and adapt to democracy.

To achieve this, the State of Gabon has already set up structures which underpin democracy: the National Assembly, the Constitutional Court and the National Council of Communication.

As regards the world of work, our Constitution also protects trade union rights and freedoms. This is borne out by the fact that there are two trade union confederations, the Gabonese Confederation of Labour and the Gabon Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing the workers of Gabon at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. In addition, our draft Labour Code is awaiting discussion at this very moment in the National Assembly.

This apprenticeship of democracy, as you will realise, has its ups and downs, especially as the world economic crisis has not spared Gabon. We are in the difficult and complex sistuation where, on the one hand, needs are growing, calls to improve living standards are becoming more pressing, demands for jobs more acute and, on the other hand, financial possibilities are decreasing and employment is becoming scarce.

Democracy is therefore potentially threatened.

We would like to express our wish to see the solidarity of the international community become a reality. The industrialised countries, if they are moved by the love of their neighbour, should come to the assistance of the developing countries which are struggling at the moment with incredible difficulties. Their multifaceted assistance should become manifest at several levels – otherwise we shall see our young democracies collapse.

It is for this reason we should first alleviate the burden of their debts and help them to improve their economies. In this respect I should like to ask the ILO to help us come to grips with the informal structure, because it does indeed create jobs. For the same reasons, I think it is important that the ILO should also provide us with assistance in the area of cooperatives because they help towards improving the standards of living of people in the countryside.

Experience has shown that no economic development can be lasting unless it aims at social progress; but also that no social progress can take place without the decisive contribution of the living resources of a nation. However, the human resources of our African countries are far from being able to meet all the imperatives of economic recovery on which the fate of democratisation depends.

I would like at this point to encourage the ILO in the work it is carrying out in cooperation with UNESCO and in its programmes of assistance to member States to help them draw up and implement human resources development policies – policies particularly aimed at reforming the teaching system, restructuring vocational training, finding jobs for newly qualified people and for the unemployed, training trainers and employing women. I trust that this session of the Conference will identify the ways and means that will make it possible in the short-and medium-term to start the process of the recovery of our economies.

Any assistance to help strengthen democracy implies – as I have said – the restructuring of our economies. It should also involve the restructuring of public administration which owes it to itself to be effective as the regulator of economic activities.

It is my wish that the ILO should intensify its assistance to our employment services and labour inspectorates and that it should continue its programme of decentralisation of technical cooperation services by giving increased support to subregional training centres for specialists such as the CRADAT.

I will not conclude without expressing my optimism that the advance of democracy throughout the world will finally see the end of the policy of apartheid, which has so long created victims of our brothers in South Africa; and I hope as well that our Arab brothers will recover all their territories and that there may be fairer conditions of work for the workers employed there. It is with these words that I shall conclude, by wishing this 79th Session of the Conference every success; I renew my congratulations to the Officers of the Conference, to the International Labour Office and to its Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, for the excellent Report that he has submitted to the Conference.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative of the World Confederation of Labour) – On behalf of the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), I would like to congratulate the President on his election and to drawn attention to the importance of the topic of the Director-General's Report. Without any doubt Democratisation and the ILO is a fundamental aspect and a major challenge to our Organisation and its constituents.

The WCL during its 72 years of existence has worked to achieve the claims of workers. Working together with all democratic trade unionism we have fought intensely against any type of totalitarianism on behalf of democracy and freedom. However, we are witnessing an attack against trade union action and labour legislation and we are not prepared to see the progress and democracy confiscated at the expense of workers, depriving democracy of its social content.

The Director-General quite correctly points to the foundations of democracy: political freedom, individual rights of citizens, equality of opportunity and justice, the participation of everybody in power and economic responsibilities. We would like to stress that these personal rights have a logical corollary in social rights: the right to work, freedom of association and trade unionism and equal participation in the distribution of wealth. True democracy is not merely a matter of political and individual rights; a truly democratic society is also democratic in the economic, social and cultural fields.

The workers' representative who is the President of our international Conference has submitted a resolution to this effect. Today we are witnessing a major liberal and capitalist offensive based on individualism, a lack of social solidarity, a vision of immediate profit, deregulation and the lack of protection for workers. And although we recognise the fundamental rules of the economy, real democracy must be based on a broader vision than a "market economy", because the market is just one more instrument of the economic process and cannot be an exclusive factor. Indeed, on the contrary, the market itself can worsen inequality and produce a greater concentration of wealth. The ILO should be very careful in its use of language because to assimilate the advance of democratisation to the development of the "market economy" could give rise to ambiguity and a certain confusion with the principles of the Organisation itself, the fundamental objective of which is to promote the rights of workers and social justice.

Therefore we find it preferable to speak of a human economy in the service of mankind and development, which would take into account instrumental aspects such as market efficiency and transparency, creativity and free initiative, legitimate and ordered competition, but which would never set aside such fundamental conditions as human dignity, the higher value of work, the universal destiny of goods, the preservation of the economy, the rationalisation of technological progress, the distribution of wealth, social development and an ethical and moral vision of society in the economy. This development must not ignore the role of an efficient democratic State which will promote the common good and social solidarity. Only if progress in freedom and democracy include the universality and the interdependence of all these factors, and if these are expressed fot the benefits of all in the new international order that is more just and responsible can we avoid the creation of growing injustices and the risks of major social explosions.

Furthermore, the view concerning the disappearance of the ideological differences is not really accurate because these differences exist as a free expression of democratic pluralism and many times also express the contradictions of the social conflict. Of course, the recognition of social conflict and ideological differences will not vanish with the disappearance of the East-West tension – which we welcome of course – nor exclude the possibilities of cooperation and mutual assistance which is a primary task of the ILO.

Another serious aspect of the process of democratisation is that it cannot be divorced from the internationalisation of the economy, which is a real and natural phenomenon, but one which also has negative and dangerous aspects. Democracy of course depends on the action of peoples themselves but also to a large extent on external conditions of a monetary, political, economic, technological and social nature, which for the most part are in the hands of the major powers, all of them industrialiaed countries. For that reason we are convinced that there can never be peace nor greater freedom and democracy as long as there is poverty and other socio-economic injustices, whose tragic consequences are more than ever visible today with the advance of a liberal and mercantilist conception of the economy and a deepening North-South gap.

The Third World countries, which represent almost 75 per cent of the world's population, above all as a result of trade and protectionism, the burden of the external debt and the international economic and financial mechanisms, are ever more poor, marginalised and dependent. This is the fate of the majority of the inhabitants of our planet.

The recent UNDP report gives us concrete facts and figures to this effect. It is hypocritical for the international financial agencies to impose conditions on developing countries that the industrialised countries do not themselves observe and it is regrettable that the GATT negotiations have been reduced to a trade war between the major economic blocks without account being taken of the serious consequences for the underdeveloped countries.

In brief, we would like to denounce and reiterate our concern at the worsening of trade union repression in many countries and we would like the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on Freedom of Association to continue their very important work which is a fundamental pillar of the ILO's action. Given the serious conflicts and war that tragically persist, we reiterate ou hope for peace, our desire for political negotiations and the reconversion of the military industry which is to a great extent responsible for the tragic events which are devastating humanity. We repeat once again that the respect for self-determination of peoples, such as those of Palestine, Kurdistan, South Africa, Bosnia and Cyprus, is an essential element in developing democracy and peaceful coexistence among nations. Nor can we fail to denounce new forms of racism which are inflicted upon immigrant workers and the tragic and inhumane repression of refugees which totally violate UN standards.

Finally, as a concrete contribution to our work, I should like to make the following proposals. First, that the ILO, in order to strengthen responsible tripartism, should give priority to workers' training and eduction; second, the ILO and the industrialised countries should play a part in the changes taking place and devote themselves to the promotion and implementation of standards, the strengthening of labour relations, the promotion of equal opportunities and the strengthening of social protection system; third, for the ILO, employment should be the priority objective in the countries of Eastern and Central Europe and the Third World because this is the most decisive avenue by which individuals and groups can progress autonomously and meet their most urgent needs; fourth, the ILO, to be effective in today's world, should also respond to the complexity of problems, to their interdependence and internationalisation. In this respect the North-South gap and the social consequences of international trade should be given greater attention by the ILO. Finally, the ratification by member States of the amendments to the Constitution of the ILO would also provide our Organisation with a broader and more democratic representation.

Mr. YARIKOV (representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to such an important and honourable post.

Allow me to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, for choosing democratisation as the subject of his Report to this Conference. We feel that this expression correctly describes the main trends in today's world. The Report gives us an overview of the world's main development, and outlines the roles, tasks and responsibilities of the ILO and its constituents at this turning point in the world's history.

Yes, the individuals, the peoples, the nations the States all want to decide their destinies themselves and genuine democracy guaranteeing individual and collective rights, the supremacy of the law, which should protect everyone equally, the application of ILO standards which provide opportunities for employment and social protection, these are the only values and preconditions that can guarantee peace in the world, efficient development and quality of life.

Achieving these aims means facing up to tremendous challenges. The presidential council meeting of the WFTU, recently held in Prague, came to the conclusion that the main challenge facing us today in all parts of the world is the deterioration of the economic and social conditions of the workers. Employment, wages, social guarantees, welfare and trade union rights, all of which constitute the basic needs for the life of each and every individual, are under serious threat. This is a result of the profound political, economic and social crisis that the world is now experiencing.

Their second conclusion was that the efforts being made to help the world out of this crisis are mainly directed towards shifting the burden onto the workers' shoulders. The rich countries are trying to place it on the shoulders of the poor, limiting their choice to one single alternative – redistribution of poverty.

To achieve this in the easiest possible way, the forces which advocate only financial profits are trying to deprive the workers of any opportunities to resist this trend effectively, thus decreasing the power and possibilities of the workers' organisations.

In some cases they are trying to advocate the law of the market economy as the law of the jungle, applying so-called "shock therapy" which does not even allow many people to survive biologically. In other cases, they are pushing for structural adjustments, accompanied by the elimination of all remaining social protection.

In yet other cases, they simply use anti-union laws, confiscating their property, introducing union-busting practices and even trying by force to suppress democratic rights and to deprive the workers of any kind of participation in the development of society. Hostility and rivalry among trade unions themselves, at the national and international levels, unfortunately contribute to this negative situation.

In many parts of the world ethnic quarrels and armed conflicts have been aggravated, resulting in numerous victims and widespread destruction which dramatically affects workers' lives particularly in some parts of Africa, Europe, Asia and the Middle East.

On the various continents and in numerous countries workers and trade unions are resisting the situation imposed on them. Many have undertaken actions of all kinds, including long and difficult strike actions. The recent wave of strikes and large protest actions in Germany, the Russian Federation, India, California, etc., are notable examples. And resistance grows. The WFTU expresses its solidarity with all workers and trade union organisations engaged in this difficult but legitimate fight for employment, a better life, social security, trade union rights and numerous other social and democratic demands. It repeats its ardent appeal for unity, cooperation and more effective solidarity among workers' organisation.

In a world full of aspirations for democracy and a better life, the ILO has an outstanding role to play in the creation of opportunities and the minimising of threats. In this respect, the WFTU supports ILO demands addressed to governments and employers to guarantee equal cooperation and participation from trade unions as permanent partners. It also supports the ILO's attempts to create and guarantee a social dimension to satisfy workers' needs in the new world after the Cold War. The WFTU welcomes the Office's suggestion that the ILO should make determined efforts to develop a policy of active partnership with all the constituents of the Organisation, particularly with workers' organisations, so as to involve them more closely in the development of the Organisation's activities, namely focusing on the social dimension of world developments, bringing the constituents closer together, and helping them to overcome the difficulties of the present transitional period. We also support the suggestion of giving priority in the ILO's forthcoming programme of action to democratisation, to the war on poverty, to the promotion of workers and the protection of their basic rights.

I think that the resolution on employment submitted by the WFTU-affiliated organisations could, once it has been merged with the other drafts on the same subject, serve as the basis for new developments in this field, and improvements to the World Employment Programme. We also hope tht the resolution concerning the rights of migrant workers will help the member States to orient their national policies towards this growing sector of the labour force.

I would like take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the efforts made so far by the Freedom of Association Committee and the IIO Governing Body to defend the legitimate rights of the WFTU as far as the WFTU headquarters in Prague are concerned. We share the view of the Freedom of Association Committee, approved last Friday by the Governing Body, which expressed regrets that the Government of Czechoslovakia has not yet been able to explain the reasons justifying the decision to expel the WFTU from Czechoslovakia. We advocate the rights of our organisation and its members, as of any other trade union, to exercice their activities freely, in all countries, without being subjected to harassment, attempts to gain political control, prohibition or administrative dissolution.

The WFTU finally stresses that trade union rights, which are an integral part of human rights, should be guaranteed in practice, in accordance with the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, as well as the ILO Constitution and respective ILO Conventions. The real value of democratic freedom, as was correctly stressed in the Report of the Director-General, is finally determined by their contribution to the fight against poverty, inequality and exploitation.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. FERREIRA MONTOYA (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – For the Portuguese employers it is a source of great satisfaction that this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference has as its President a Portuguese who is well-known in economic, social and labour fields. I should like therefore to congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in carrying out his high functions.

The Report of the Director-General submitted to this session of the International Labour Conference, like other earlier reports, has dealt with an important subject for the ILO, in this case: "Democratisation and the ILO." The major political changes which have taken place in recent years, and in the last two or three years in particular, and which in certain cases in some countries have resulted in the emergence of new sovereign States, have brought the question of democracy to the forefront in terms of its merits and its difficulties. But always, as the Director-General's Reports have correctly said, as an instrument of freedom.

The most recent developments in this worldwide trend towards democratic regimes are referred to in the Director-General's Report. Of these most significant events, I should like to point to the dismantling of the Berlin Wall in November 1989, and to the fact, also mentioned in the Director-General's Report that some 20 African countries have adopted pluralist constitutions and have organised elections, as well as to the fact that in several countries in Asia democracy has made a comeback.

These signs of the vitality of democratic ideals naturally give rise on the part of those who love liberty and individual initiative to strengthened hope of more open political and economic relations among States which will gain new impetus with the growth of international trade and the globalisation of the economy.

Moreover, the adoption of democratic regimes allows the autonomy of the social partners to develop, thus favouring social dialogue, a reduction of interventionism by public administrations and the growth of international cooperation.

I will now refer very briefly to three major themes, all inseparable from the global issues of democracy which is a prerequisite for the implementation of a more intense international cooperation and franker dialogue.

I will begin by stessing the advantages of international cooperation on the environment, then I will refer to the link that we need to bear in mind, in the context of more intense international trade, between standards and bureaucratic requirements imposed by States and international organisations, e.g. the ILO and the EEC, on enterprises in the areas of health, hygiene and safety at work, and the compatibility of these legislative and administrative measure with the need to be competitive. Thirdly and finally, I will make a number of comments regarding the very topical subject of strikes. This very serious reality of strikes which have recently occurred in Portugal mean that once again there is a real need for a realistic and balanced regulation of the legitimate use of strikes.

As we know, the question of the environment is becoming crucially important throughout the world not only because of the growing volume of ecological problems related to it but also because of the seriousness of some of these problems.

We can see a growing awareness, particularly in the most technologically advanced countries, as to the need to promote the maintenance, recovery and improvement of environmental factors.

In this specific area, we can see a certain number of possibilities which, from the standpoint of correcting existing environmental imbalances, could result from closer international cooperation for the exchange of information among States on ecological data as well as for the assessment of policies and measures taken with regard to the environment.

It is also important to stress that, while recognising the merits of close international cooperation aimed at resolving environment-linked problems, we should always bear in mind that cooperation must be adapted to the needs of each country or region, so that environmental policies and actions put into practice will not hinder industrial development and economic progress in each individual country.

Like the question of environment, issues relating to conditions of health, hygiene and safety at work have become increasingly important, particularly in the most developed countries, and in particular in the member States of the European Economic Community.

In fact, in those countries the trend of legal development has been towards the adoption of numerous standards imposing tight constraints on enterprises in terms of the protection of workers' safety and health.

The effect of these new standards has been that employers have had to make major changes in plant facilities and adopt new methods of work organisation and production. Naturally, this has meant considerable financial commitment for the purchase of new equipment and to intensify training programmes. This financial commitment has, of course, caused in its turn higher production costs for European enterprises and particularly for those operating in Portugal.

At the same time, in other regions of the world, it is evident that standards of health, hygiene and safety at work are less strict.

This, of course, has an effect on competitiveness to the detriment of those enterprises that are subject to much stricter protective regulations which often do not take into consideration the negative effects to which I have referred.

Recognition of these negative factors with their impact on the social arena means that employers sometimes feel that some of the requirements are unreasonable and ask the State for financial and tax relief which would enable them to implement the standards and maintain a healthy enterprise while at the same time preserving their productivity and creating jobs.

Finally, as I said at the outset, I want to make a number of comments on the whole question of strikes the unsatisfactory legal settlement of which in a world which is increasingly open to international trade, can create serious problems for competitiveness and have an unacceptable effect on the life of citizens.

The Portuguese case is a good example of strike legislation which is out of step with the economic, social and political reality.

Indeed, the law in force is deficient and inadequate so that in Portugal there is every type of stoppage including those due to reasons unrelated to the workplace, such as political objectives.

The fact is that the existing laws do not really define strike action nor do they present the use of strikes as a final recourse by workers when they have exhausted all other possibilities of peaceful resolution of work disputes, in particular, negotiation between the parties direct concerned.

In Portugal, the recent series of long transport strikes which meant serious losses for the national economy has emphasised that we need to rewrite our laws on strikes.

But this is obviously not an exclusively Portuguese problem. More and more, in the EEC as a whole and in other political geographic areas, strikes are affecting strategic and vital areas of national life such as transport, water, gas, electricity with a magnitude and frequency that affects seriously not only the economy but also the whole quality of national life.

We feel that this is an item that should be put on the agenda of a future International Labour Conference. The right to strike should always be based on the balance between the negative effects of a strike and the interests of the workers and citizens.

This is an urgent matter which, without prejudice to the right to strike, must be brought within balanced and reasonable limits to prevent the specific interests of some classes of workers, who often enjoy privileged conditions, causing serious harm to and often imparing for lengthy periods the conditions of life of other citizens.

Original – Russian: Mr. GONCHARIK (Workers' delegate, Belarus) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election to this very lofty post and wish him every success in this far from easy yet extremely important task.

The subject under consideration in the detailed Report of the Director-General is undoubtedly very topical both from the theoretical and practical point of view.

The development of democracy, observance of basic human rights and principles of social justice are indispensable prerequisites for the establishment of a free society. We support the Report's assertion that "the law of the market should point the way to prosperity for all".

Our federation of trade unions is trying to maximise its effort to ensure that Belarus is a free, independent, democratic State, unconditionally respecting human rights, a State where there is no room for racial or national differences, discrimination regarding social status and political opinions. So, we must turn our attention to resolving a multitude of interrelated problems. Trade unions must remain true to their cause and defend the social and economic rights and interests of the workers. Whilst standing firm at a time when production is falling and we are switching to a market economy, we are basing our actions on the need to create a social partnership as a way of maintaining consensus in the country and a balance of power in society. It is our objective to conclude, this year, a tripartite agreement between employers, the Government and trade unions. Despite the fact that the process of setting up employers' organisations has not been completed and the State has not yet given them the functions they need under market conditions, we have managed to reach an understanding and provide for guarantees with regard to employment, how to avoid mass unemployment whilst raising wages in line with price increases, and ensuring social protection for workers including pensioners and students.

This is extremely important as the economic situation is deteriorating. We can see the need for putting increasing pressure on the Government. It has to promote the development of business activity, the growth of entrepreneurship, job creation and retraining for workers who have been made redundant. Although for the time being we do not have a large number of unemployed (aroud 5,000 persons, whilst there are 4.5 million in work), hidden unemployment lurks beneath the surface, with job losses due to plants closing, half-time work, short working weeks and involuntary unpaid leave.

We also see a need to coordinate the activities of trade unions in the CIS, since our economies are so closely linked and are suffering due to the disruption of economic relations.

The situation in Belarus has also been complicated by the catastrophic consequences of the Chernobyl accident. Vast numbers of people are still living in irradiated areas while awaiting resettlement to unaffected regions. The number of diseases has been increasing, particularly among children. It is now clear that the consequences will be felt for many generations in Belarus.

We are counting on the ILO to coodinate assistance for people living in areas affected by the Chernobyl explosion. In our opinion, the Radiation Protection Convention, 1962 (No. 115), requires substantial revision in the light of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power station and accidents in other countries as well.

We also feel that the ILO's participation in the implementation of training and retraining projects for supervisory personnel and of workers' education programmes should be increased. In this connection, we share the views and conclusion of the ICFTU employers' organisations held in Brussels in April of this year.

We feel that it would be useful to hold a meeting of the Ministers of Labour and the leaders of the employers' and workers' organisation of the central and eastern European countries under the aegis of the ILO, with the participation of the IMF and the World Bank, so as to discuss the situation in the field of employment and questions such as the growth of wages and migration. The main point is to make the transitional period as painless as possible. Recommendations on economic and social adjustments would be very useful.

We also support the proposal to revise the World Employment Programme in view of the fact that many countries have moved towards a market economy and the introduction of new technologies. We feel that such a draft should be put before a session of the International Labour Conference.

One of the main tasks before us is the restoration of workers' confidence in trade unions. We are reforming existing unions, and creating new ones and adapting them to the new conditions. The trade unions are being renewed as new people are elected. In our opinion, it is also important that the State should provide guarantees for the reorganisation of the trade union movement. There have been attempts by the State to restrict the influence of the unions, and that is why we pressed for the adoption of the Republic of Belarus Trade Union Act. It was passed, and now provides guarantees for freedom of association, the right to strike, and the right for trade unions to own property and to conduct activities.

We also have on the agenda the adoption of a new Labour Code, and of laws concerning collective agreements, the settlement of collective and individual labour disputes, occupational safety and other matters. Our federation is directly involved in the preparation of these laws. We consider the adoption of such laws as an important condition for the development of a constructive and effective trade union movement, and the conduct of industrial relations on a just and democratic basis, as the preceding speaker has said.

Finally, I am convinced that the activities and influence of the International Labour Organisation with regard to the process of democratisation and social and economic process in the interest of workers must be strengthened. Our federation will work toward this objective.

Mr. KAMBO (Minister of Labour, Energy and Power, Sierra Leone) – On behalf of the people and Government of Sierra Leone and on my behalf, please allow me to congratulate the President warmly on his election to the most important office of President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. His unanimous election clearly shows the amount of confidence and esteem this body has for him. We believe that with the experience at his behest he will bring this Session to a successful close. I would also like to congratulate all the other Officers of the Conference.

The Director-General has done a thorough job as we can see from his Report submitted to the Conference. Please allow me to register our profound gratitude for an excellent Report. The theme of the Director-General's Report to this year's session – Democratisation and the ILO – could not have come at a more opportune time. The wind of change which is blowing across the globe is not confined to continents, subregions or States. We in Sierra Leone are not unaffected by such a change.

Sierra Leone had been under the rule of a one-party system of government for over a decade. Under pressure from both within and without, however, the then Government of the All People's Congress Party was forced to accede to certain political reforms. A National Constitutional Review Commission was set up in 1990 to look into the 1978 one-party Constitution and to make a number of recommendations, including the introduction of multi-party rule. The Commission, which was broadly based in its composition, did an excellent job and presented its report to the Government in May 1991. The report was immediately referred to Cabinet for consideration and then to Parliament for ratification. In a referendum held in August 1991 the people of Sierra Leone overwhelmingly approved the 1991 multi-party Constitution. The referendum was followed by the registration of political parties. A new Electoral Commissioner was appointed and a review of the voters' list was embarked upon.

With all these developments taking place, people might wonder why the military removed the civilian administration from office. The reasons for this are the following: whilst these developments were taking place, the then Government was busy undermining the very basis of such institutions and processes behind the scenes. The then APC Government was operating under two Constitutions simultaneously: the 1978 one-party Constitution and the 1991 multi-party Constitution. But for our timely intervention in April 1992 our country could have headed for a constitutional crisis. The electoral system was manipulated by the former Government and this resulted in the removal from office as Electoral Commissioner of a man well respected by all the opposition parties, and replaced by someone of the former Government's choice against the wishes of the other political parties. The partial review of the voters' list was challenged by opposition parties and the public but the then APC Government would not listen. Offers by international election monitoring teams to help ensure free and fair elections were turned down.

Whilst these fraudulent activities were taking place in the political arena, politicians and other well-placed individuals were busy plundering the resources of the country. Corruption, tribalism and nepotism became the order of the day. Whilst our gallant soldiers and other patriotic citizens were engaged in pushing back the rebels in the eastern and southern regions of the country, the little extra ressources generated to fight the war were being pocketed by the deposed President and his corrupt cohorts. The plundering became so intense over the years that Sierra Leone, which can boast of immense resources, went down in the annals of the United Nations as the poorest country in the world. Social infrastructure was allowed to degenerate to an all-times low. At a press conference following the military take-over, our new Head of State, Captain Valentine Strasser, noted that the infant mortality rate in Sierra Leone was now the highest in the world; and that health services and social infrastructure had been in a serious state of decay for a prolonged period. Surely, these are not records one should be proud of. These and many more examples of mismanagement prompted the military to act swiftly and decisively before the very bad people responsible for those crimes against our people positioned themselves to sustain power.

We want to assure our friends, supporters and well-wishers all over the world that the new military administration has no ambition to remain in power indefinitely.

Our Government has set itself a number of goals, the main ones being: the conclusion of the war in the shortest possible time; the rehabilitation of the war-torn areas and the repatriation of refugees and displaced people; the introduciton of discipline and accountability to the business of government, and the return to multi-party democracy.

Our Government fully respects fundamental human and trade union rights and the continued respect for such basic human and trade union rights will remain to be the preoccupation of my Government. All law-abiding people and groups, including trade unions, have no reason to be afraid. My Government will continue to respect all ratified Conventions and protocols and we are fully committed to the economic recovery programme already approved by the IMF and above all, the Government is fully determined to exercise maximum fiscal discipline.

Having given a profile of the events that necessitated the ousting of the former civilian regime, please allow me at this stage to register our country's appreciation of the role which the ILO has been playing and continues to play in the democratic process. The promotion of tripartism at the workplace is not only a useful exercise in ensuring that democratic principles are observed in the industrial arena, but has also provided a training ground for the practice and promotion of democratic principles in the political field. We wish to note the particular role played by the ILO in providing training to trade unionists in the form of seminars, workshops, etc. We all share the view that if the process of democracy is to be sustained, it is a prerequisite that groups, such as trade unions, should know what the process is, how it works and what its contextual constraints are.

While many developing countries have today accepted the inevitability of structural adjustment programmes as the way of providing remedial measures to the ailing economies of such countries, not every country is convinced of the merits of such programmes. However, what we all are convinced of is the fact that there is a human and social cost involved in the implementation of such programmes. Workers, women and young persons become most vulnerable and bear the brunt of the reform measures. Such groups have been known to respond to such measures of structural adjustments by resorting to strike action and riots. Fragile democracies can hardly survive in an atmosphere of strikes and riots. The pioneering role of the ILO (together with the UNDP and the African Development Bank) in ensuring that vulnerable groups bearing the brunt of the structural reform measures are provided with safety nets under the social dimension of adjustment programmes, is invaluable. My delegation joins the rest of the interntional community in calling on the ILO to play a more active role in the adjustment programmes established by the IMF and the World Bank. Unless the international community is prepared to allocate more resources in order to cushion the effects of structural reform, the future of democracy in many developing countries in Africa in particular may well be compromised.

Before concluding this address, let me on behalf of my Government and the people of Sierra Leone register my profound appreciation and gratitude to the ILO for sponsoring a number of useful programmes and projects in Sierra Leone, including the Employment Promotion Programme, the labour law review and the labour-intensive public works projects, all of which have contributed to the enhancement of employment promotion, the alleviation of poverty and the improvement of human resources in my country.

As we understand it, democracy is not simply about giving people the right to vote. It is mostly about satisfying people's basic rights to education and healthy work in an environment conducive to development. By removing the former Government from power my Government removed the main obstacle to such rights in Sierra Leone. But democracy is also more than that: it is about participating in decisions that affects our lives.

I have the pleasure to inform you that my Government intends a to start making a real contribution to the Organisation so that we can regain our rights and our rightful place within the ILO.

Finally, on behalf of my delegation and on my own personal behalf I wish to thank you for permitting me to address the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. BOATENG (Secretary for Mobilisation and Social Welfare, Ghana) – Allow me to join previous speakers in congratulating the President and the other Officers on their election to preside over the deliberations of this session. It is my hope and that of my delegation that under their wise and able leadership the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will be both successful and fruitful.

Permit me also to commend the Director-General of the ILO for both his foresight and tireless efforts in responding promptly to the major challenges that workers in various parts of the world are encountering as a result of the current socio-political and economic changes. Until this turbulent situation stabilises, workers in the countries concerned will continue to look up to the leadership of the ILO for both moral and material support as well as guidance. We have no doubt that the Director-General and his staff will rise to the occasion as they have always done when they receive such requests for assistance.

The theme for the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference could not have been more appropriate. The choice of the theme of Democratisation and the ILO, for this year's session amply demonstrates that the Director-General is abreast with current developments the world over. It also underscores the importance the Director-General attaches to democracy, and the ILO's commitment to the processes of change that are taking place in several parts of the world today. It is our hope that the Director-General's efforts in support of these changes will be endorsed by the older democracies and indeed the whole international community for we believe that they would lead eventually to an improvement in the working and living conditions of our peoples and the promotion of their civil and political rights.

It is in this connection that my delegation would like to applaud the Director-General for the timely and wise call, contained in his Report, to the international community to respond positively to recent political, economic and social changes in the world. We are particularly impressed by the sections of the Report which draw the attention of the developing world to the catastrophic consequences of civil strife and the abuse of political power.

Thanks to the foresight and the initial commitment of the Government of the Provisional National Defence Council to build participatory democracy in Ghana, and to this end the systematic pursuit of its programmes, we have been able to avert some of the unfortunate experiences others are going through in view of the radical transformation of the political and economic structures in some parts of the world. With the adoption of a new Constitution through a referendum in April this year, the march towards a democratic form of government in Ghana is now far advanced. According to the political programme for the rest of the year, presidential and parliamentary elections are due to follow in November and December respectively, while the Fourth Republic will be ushered in in January 1993. In this important national exercise, we cherish the hope that the people of Ghana can count on the goodwill and support of not only the Director-General and the staff of the ILO, but of all friendly countries and the international community as a whole.

The leadership in Ghana realised the need to restructure the economy about a decade ago and accordingly adopted an economic recovery programme following consultations with the world's financial institutions in 1982. A decade later, we continue to follow the programme because we recognise the need to build a strong and viable economy that will serve as the foundation for the democratic structures we are in the process of erecting.

Our economic recovery programme was designed to look beyond growth and was targeted at the reduction of poverty, the enjoyment of greater equity, easy access to education, health and balanced diet as well as the protection of the environment. We have never relented in the pursuit of these objectives, in spite of the serious constraints we have experienced from the unfair terms of world trade.

Our commitment to restructure the economy stems from our strong belief that providing the individual citizen with the opportunity not only to participate fully in decision-making at all levels, but also to enjoy human, economic and political freedoms, is the best way to ensure our national unity and protect its integrity.

My delegation is gratified to note the ILO's condinued interest in the promotion of democracy, the alleviation of poverty and its untiring efforts to improve the lot of workers. We believe, however, that in line with the democratisation process currently sweeping several parts of the world, the ILO should intensify its assistance programmes with a view to strengthening employers' and workers' organisations as well as promoting tripartite cooperation as a solid basis for building and sustaining democratic culture among the social partners. The thrust of such technical assistance, we believe, should be directed towards building the institutional capacity of States to enable them to respond to our people's aspirations for a greater material well-being and security, freedom and dignity.

One of the major preoccupations of the Government of Ghana and its social partners in their efforts to promote labour-related programmes has been the strenthening of the principles and practice of tripartite consultations. Through institutional arrangements such as the Tripartite Committee on Wages and Salaries, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and Joint Negotiation Machinery, we have built a strong culture of tripartite cooperation among the social partners. These arrangements have contributed to a better understanding, tolerance and respect for each other's rights and has thus served as an effective basis for the maintenance of industrial peace which, in turn, has led to stability and progress in my country.

The Director-General, in Part II of his Report, has enumerated several programmes undertaken by the ILO in 1991. Ghana has been both an active participant in and a direct beneficiary of some of these programmes and activities, for which we are most grateful to the Director-General and his staff. We are particularly grateful to ARLAC for the important role it is playing in the area of training in labour administration. The benefits Ghana has derived from this form of assistance have been tremendous.

My delegation is also pleased to note that the Director-General's Report places due emphasis on employment and development. We subscribe to the view that employment promotion in the rural and informal sector is crucial to any economic development.

In Ghana, as in other developing countries, the economy subsists in the main on agriculture. There is therefore a need to promote this sector by improving efficiency in the production of cash crops, food crops and livestock. Furthermore, the traditional agricultural sector, which has remained the largest employer of labour in our economies, should be given every encouragment and the means to expand. A boost in agricultural production would lead not only to self-sufficiency in food production. It would also pave the way for the establishment of agro-based industries which, in turn, would provide new job opportunities for the unemployed and create new occupations and professions.

The important role of the informal sector in our economic recovery process cannot be over-emphasised. The industrial development policies which Ghana has pursued over the past couple of years have been accompanied by the develoment of small-scale, labour-intensive enterprises, all of which have spread rapidly through the economy, both in urban and rural areas. The informal sector has expanded to the extent of absorbing a satisfactory number of potential jobseekers and has contributed to the develoment of skills through non-formal apprenticeships. The achievement of these goals would not have been possible without external assistance. It is in this regard that my delegation would like to use this forum – and the opportunity it offers – to commend the ILO, other international organisations, as well as donor organisations and all friendly countries, for the various forms of technical assistance extended to us. We hope that the ILO will sustain such activities and expand them to areas that remain yet uncovered.

In conclusion, I wish to observe that by committing itself to the improvement of the lot of workers the ILO is rendering a great service not only to individuals but to whole families and societies the world over. By additionally committing itself to the promotion of the principles and practice of democracy and the alleviation of poverty, the ILO is addressing those basic issues that, hopefully, will help usher in the ideal society we all aspire. In this endeavour, the Director-General can count on the fullest cooperation of the Government and people of Ghana.

Mr. WITBOOI (Minister of Labour and Manpower Development, Namibia) – I want to start by congratulating the President and the other officers on their elections . I am quite confident that the very qualities which made their election possible will ensure that this Conference, in terms of the quality of its deliberations and its subsequent resolutions, will be a success.

I thank the Govening Body for having made it possible for me to address this august body.

In the same breath I hasten to thank the Director-General for his magnanimous Report to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation made an in-depth and systematic study of this comprehensive Report, and I can proudly inform you that in terms of relevance and validity, the contents and thrust of the Report are admirably in line with the national priorities and concerns of the Republic of Namibia.

On 31 July 1990 the Government of the Republic of Namibia adopted a national Policy on Labour and Manpower Development. This policy is squarely based on the increasingly crystalising thesis that human resources are the most valuable single national asset. To this end the Government of the Republic of Namibia has undertaken to protect, develop and utilise human resources to their fullest potential. A need was felt to make the human resources development policy an integral part of our national economic development plan. In doing so, it is hoped that a viable matching of the demand and supply of labour will be achieved. Optimal cooperation and consultation between the Government, employees and employers is to be encouraged.

Acknowledging the limitations of the formal education system efficiently and sufficiently to prepare prospective jobseekers for the labour market, the Governement of the Republic of Namibia felt the need to establish a national vocational training and testing system. This system covers any vocational training activity by both private and public institutions in all economic sectors.

Recognising the inherited heavily skewed distribution of skills on grounds of race and gender that characterises our labour force, article 23 of the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia provides for the application of affirmative action to redress socio-economic imbalances caused by past colonial practices and outmoded traditional outlooks.

A national development plan and the commitment to enhance the optimal utilisation of human resources imply a fundamental restructuring and reordering of the organisation and running of our labour-relations system. In this connection, our Labour Code (Act 6, 1992) was promulgated on 8 April 1992. It covers all aspects of the employment relationship, that is, basic conditions and terms of employment, termination of employment contracts, health, safety and welfare at work, discrimination, harassment and victimisation.

As part of the implementation of the new Labour Code, my Ministry (assisted by ILO experts) is currently running seminars across the length and breadth of the country to familiarise the public with the content of the new Labour Code. The requisite institutional infrastructure is being set up.

However, our national effort towards development, equity and social justice is being hampered by a number of obstacles. There are budgetary constraints and fiscal limitations which present Namibia with serious financial problems. We inherited a foreign debt of about 700 million rand. Economic stagnation nationally and a prolonged recession globally, combine to make the Namibian economic landscape look all the more gloomy. The rate of unemployment is currently estimated at 40 per cent; the rate of inflation stands at 20.4 per cent; the economic growth rate is estimated at 2.3 per cent, whilst the population grows at a rate of 3 per cent per year. Recent survey of the population, with regard to its composition in terms of age, indicated that about 55 per cent of the Namibian population is under the age of 40 years. This means that there are many new entrants into the labour market. All this has been exacerbated by the drought, haunting the whole of southern Africa.

Having said that, it is fitting and appropriate to note that our development effort is being attempted against a backdrop of a "whirlwind of democratisation", sweeping across the globe in general, and Africa in particular. Being sensitive to the issue of human rights (chapter 3 of the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia), our Gouvernment espouses a participatory approach to development. Among other things, serious attention is given to the active participation of women in decision-making and development projects.

Moreover, I must stress that the democratisation process presupposes social justice and equity. In a subregional context, with apartheid in place and intact, democratisation and effective development would remain all but elusive objectives.

Part of the territory of Namibia, that is the Port of Walvis Bay, is still occupied illegally by South Africa, thus hampering the extension of social justice and economic development to that part of the country.

In regard to efforts being made to alleviate the scourge of unemployment, the Government of the Republic of Namibia encourages the emergence, development and extension of the informal sector, both as an income-generating and as a source of self-employment.

Nevertheless, against the background of an oppressive colonial dispensation that neither allowed nor tolerated any informal sector activity, there is a stigma vis-à-vis the emergent and rapidly expanding informal sector. In a word, our informal sector faces a "legitimation crisis". In terms of labour relations, there is a need for the unionisation of the informal sector. This is a daunting task facing our social partners; the employers in the formal sector should show more understanding for the informal sector, and the trade union movement should strive to bring the informal sector under the mould of the formal labour relations system.

To this end, may I conclude by saying that the most vulnerable, that is the unskilled, the illiterate, etc., need the assistance of the international community, mainly in the field of training. Policies, including structural adjustment proposals, should take into account these sensibilities.

In the final analysis, I wish to extend our gratitude to the ILO for the assistance rendered for both the design of our human resources development programmes and the assistance provided in producing the Labour Code.

I wish the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference all the best and hope that it will deliberate constructively and come up with useful and progressive proposals and resolutions.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CAYETANO TOHERIDA (Government delegate, Equatorial Guinea) – I should like to join with the speakers who preceded me in warmly congratulating the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his unanimous election to this high office. I should also like to congratulate the other Officers of the Conference.

I convey special greetings to the delegations of the new member States of the ILO family, whom I welcome and congratulate.

Turning to the important items on our agenda, and in particular to the excellent Report that the Director-General has submitted to this assembly, the first part of which is entiled Democratisation and the ILO, we are very pleased that the discussion of this issue coincides with the time in which the process of democratisation in our country is acheving its highest aims.

The democratisation of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea began in August 1979, after the overthrow of the dictatorial regime which had ruled the country for the first decade of national independence. It has gradually gathered strength with the promulgation and implementation of a new legal order which guarantees the civil and political rights and freedoms of citizens, the highest expression of which is the Constitution which was adopted in November 1991. This instrument establishes the basis for the rule of law in our country within universally recognised principles. It also establishes the institutions which independently represent each of the three branches of Government, and opens the way to a political multiparty system, whose establishment, in peace and order, has been entrusted by the Head of State to the current transitional Government.

Under the Constitution, and in order to allow greater participation in the exercise of individual and collective rights and freedoms, we are putting into practice a whole series of legal provisions to bring the actions of individuals and State bodies into line with requirements and aspirations of our current economic, social and cultural reality; these include the Amnisty Act, which pardons political acts and omissions defined as political crimes by the Penal Code and other special legislation when such acts took place prior to 2 December 1991, and authorises all citizens of Equatorial Guinea who resided abroad to return to the country and set up residence; the Act governing the right to file complaints and petitions; the Act on political parties of 3 January 1992, which governs the formation of political parties for the establishment of pluralistic democracy; at present a number of political parties have been organised and are operating under this Act; the Act governing religious freedoms.

In the social and labour field we can point to the revision of the General Labour Act and the Social Security Act, which have been adapted to the principles of the ILO on freedom of hiring, working time, the protection of wages, maternity protection, equal pay, equality of treatment and opportunity, freedom and stability in employment, prevention of occupational hazards, etc. I should also mention the Act which promotes and stimulates the development of cooperatives.

The development of human resources, the improvement of vocational training and employement are priority objectives for the Government in order to promote sustained socio-economic development in the country, based on the efforts of the people of Equatorial Guinea, with assistance from the outside. We are also concerned about preserving the environment in general and the working environment. To this end, we have continuing programmes of training supervisors, both in the public and private sectors, and recently we have also had seminars on workers' education, occupational safety and health, social and labour standards, social security, etc. We would like to point out that all these achievements have come about with the assistance of the international community and the ILO in particular, for which we express our gratitude and hope that they will continue to provide their very valuable help.

At present the Government is considering a Bill on occupational associations and collective labour relations in order to ensure and promote the free exercise of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Bill is based on the Constitution, the socio-economic structure of the society, where the private sector has a primary role to play in developing the national economy, and is inspired by the principles of the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the ILO Conventions on freedom of association and the right to organise.

In summary, these are some of the actions that have been undertaken by the Government of Equatorial Guinea in order to adapt its actions to the modern socio-political structures; we intend to continue in this line in order to improve the living conditions of our citizens and to preserve national peace and harmony.

Before I conclude this modest intervention, I should like to congratulate the Organisation and the International Labour Office, in particular, for all the work they have done in 1991, as described in the Report of the Governing Body and the relevant parts of the Director-General's Report. We very much appreciate all the work that has been done to implement the resolutions and decisions taken by earlier sessions of the International Labour Conferences.

The Government of the Republic of Equatorial Guinea wishes the Conference every success and is conviced that the debates and concusions of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will help to consolidate democracy among our peoples, to the benefit of all of humanity, a task in which the ILO, with its excellent structure, inspiring principles and accumulated experience, has an important role to play.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful the Compassionate. I should like to start – on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Kuwait which groups the employers in my country and which I have the honour to represent – by congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election.

We are reaching the end of the eighth decade of sessions of this Conference. The seven preceding decades have witnessed major upheavals; but the consecutive and radical changes of this decade have changed the course of history beyond anyone's expectations and taken a direction that nobody could predict. Nothing testifies to this better than the demise of an international order that had had a firm grip on many a nation and people for as long as 70 years – and the emergence of a new international order, advocating international legitimacy and announcing a global democratisation and freedom of peoples from the yoke of tyrannical and totalitarian regimes. It is perhaps this that prompted the Director-General to choose democratisation as the theme of his Report to this Session, a most fortunate choice, worthy of respect, because it is closely linked to events that have occurred on the international scene during the past two years – although the first signs could be detected several years ago.

However, the optimism that has accompanied these changes has been somewhat tempered because of the follies of those who hanker after former totalitarian regimes – and who have been blinded by the glow of liberation. The examples of Kuwait yesterday and Bosnia-Herzegovina are there for us to see.

The Director-General has clearly expressed the ILO's position towards freedom and human rights. Indeed, he states in his report that: "the ILO takes a keen interest in civil and political rights" and that "the denial of the civil liberties set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights makes a mockery of the very notion of trade union rights. For the normal exercise of these rights requires respect for the individual's right to freedom and security, protection against arbitrary arrest and detention, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of assembly, the right to an equitable trial by an independent and impartial court, and the right to the protection of trade union property."

These words taken from the Report of the Director-General affirm that human rights, as specified in charters and international convenants, are indivisible. They also tell us that we must not halt before the frontiers that the theoreticians of the age of darkness and totalitarian systems erected on the grounds that crossing over them would imply entering into a political area – contrary to the tradition of this venerable organisation. You know very well that this was a vain pretention and only a mask to hide their deformities. the Director-General has removed this mask by statingh unequivocally in his Report that political, civil and trade union freedoms are indivisible – and inextricably bound to democracy.

The crime that was perpetrated against the Kuwaiti people on the night of 2 August 1990 would not have happened had the aggressor had any regard for human rights and freedoms. The studies, analyses and reports which have sought to clarify the reasons for this aggression have agreed that a desire for authoritarian and arbitrary power made the aggressor commit that crime in the absence of any democratic regime which alone can prevent governments from following their iniquitous ambitions. A little peace-loving state was thus almost obliterared from the map of the world. However, thanks to international democracy which unanimously supported law and legality, Kuwait managed to retrieve its sovereignty and freedom and to resume its modest role in consolidating the values and principles of law and peace for the sake of humanity as a whole.

Within this context, a few days ago, on 16 May 1992, Kuwait hosted the third session of the Joint Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs, in accordance with the provisions of the cooperation agreement between the European Community and the Cooperation Council for the Arab States of the Gulf. This session achieved positive results which provide support for progress, democracy, and the respect of human rights, beginning with the respect of the sovereignty, unity, independance and the territorial security of all States in the region. The session called for the rapid and total application of all Security Council resolutions concerning human rights, in particular those concerning the consequences of the Iraqi aggression against the State of Kuwait. It requested Iraq to respect all these resolutions, including those concerning the payment of compensation for the loss and damage resulting from its aggression against the State of Kuwait, and the liberation of all prisoners and hostages which it still holds, be they Kuwaiti or nationals of other countries.

The statement by the Director-General concerning the comprehensive relationship between civil, political and trade union freedoms is corroborated by the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association in its report No. 279, on the conclusions of its examination of the complaint lodged by the State of Kuwait, in its tripartite composition, and the International Employers' Organisation and the World Federation of Trade Unions against the violations commited by the Iraqi forces of aggession against trade union freedoms and which resulted in the destruction and pillaging of trade union premises and acts of theft and the liquidation of trade unions and the arrest and exile of trade union leaders.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA): Please keep to the subject under discussion and avoid raising questions which are unrelated.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM – I am talking about the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General and the preparatory report which covers the agenda of the Governing Body.

Allow me to proceed because I have not departed from the agenda.

The report has confirmed the truth of all the facts that were contained in the complaint as well as the fact that the Iraqi Government refused to answer the accusations on the pretext that they were no longer valid since Iraq had withdrawn from Kuwait! As if the criminal had the right not to be judged any more and to avoid punishment, simply because he had withdrawn the dagger from his victim's breast after perpetrating his crime.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA): The delegate of Iraq wishes to intervene on a point of order.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GHARIB – I understand, on the basis of the Standing Orders of the Conference, that the Kuwaiti delegate has spoken of questions that fall outside the competence of this body and I would request that the Chaiman exercise his authority in accordance with article 4, paragraph 14, of the Standing Orders.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – I urge you, Sir, to avoid discussing issues that are not really under discussion today.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM – There is a report that was submitted to the Governing Body regarding the question of trade union freedoms. This was discussed at the last session of the Governing Body only a few days before this Session of the Conference and I refer to page 7 of that report on freedom of association.

I believe I have not raised issues that fall outside on our agenda. I am talking about matters encompassed within the mandate of this Conference.

I do have one soft word of regret, which we hope the Director-General will take with an open heart. The Director-General referred in his Report to the role of the Church in the promotion of democratisation in various parts of the world, which no-one would deny. At the same time he somehow overlooked the role of another establishment, which is no less important, that of the Moslem mosques, which are considered amongst the most important centres of teaching, culture and the liberation struggle. By way of example, it was from the mosque that the movement of the Afghan freedom-fighters began. It was from the mosque also that the cries for liberation and the rising up of the children in Palestine who throw stones against Zionist occupiers began, and it was also from the mosque that the Kuwaiti resistance movement set out against the Iraqi invasion forces.

Many other examples could be given. Islam is a religion of consultation, equality and human dignity to which all democratic regimes aspire. An Arab is better than a non-Arab only because of his devotion. Human beings are all equal like the teeth of a comb. Why do you oppress human beings when their mothers brought them into this world free? The mosque in Islam is not only a place of prayer; it is also a school, a place of learning, a centre of information, a place in which to appeal for freedom, fraternity and equality, and for the struggle to achieve these goals.

Because of the ten-minute time limit, let me recall quickly the appreciation of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of Kuwait for the efforts and activities of the ILO, its Governing Body, committees and Director-General, all of which are set forth in Part II of the Report. However, I should like to draw attention once again to the delay in the publication of the Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories, which appears in the appendices (Volume 2) to the Director General's Report. I have already drawn attention to this delay in previous sessions. If I am making this comment here, it is because I believe in the rightness of the cause of the Arab Palestinian people. I also believe that the rights of man and his freedoms are indivisible, irrespective of the cowardly and regrettable position taken by the leadership on behalf of the Palestinian people during the aggression against Kuwait and the occupation of its territory.

Allow me at the end, by way of conclusion to repeat from this tribune the slogan that we Kuwaitis now use in all international forums: "My God, have pity for our valiant martyrs and free our innocent prisoners held in the prisons and concentration camps of Iraq." May the peace and grace of God be with you!

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – Before I can give Mr. Gharib (Workers' delegate, Iraq) the right to reply, I should like to remind the delegates of the statement made by the President during the general discussion and in particular the following: a reply should refer only to the point under discussion. It should be brief, not exceed two minutes and should not give rise to any further remarks. Lastly, it should be expressed in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debates it has been a practice of the President to refuse to allow replies to a right of reply. Now I give the floor to Mr. Gharib.

Original – Arabic: – Mr. GHARIB (Workers' delegate, Iraq) – I would have preferred not to take the floor. But I have no choice because of the manner in which the Kuwaiti delegate spoke. He lied about persons detained in Iraq. Thousands and thousands of non-Kuwaitis have been expelled from Kuwait and there is not one single trade union member in Kuwait; there is no trade union and no political party. There have been thousands of rapes of women in Kuwait – both nationals and non-nationals.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

Credentials

First report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 79th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Santiago Pérez del Castillo, Government delegate, Uruguay, Chairman; Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, Employers' substitute delegate, Argentina; and Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organisation represented at the Conferfence is at present 145. To date 12 member States (Bahamas, Benin, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Dominica, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Solomon Islands) have not sent a delegation.

Accredited delegates and advisers

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 556, comprising 283 Government delegates, 134 Employers' delegates and 139 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 1,380 accredited advisers, comprising 671 Government advisers, 331 Employers' advisers and 378 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 1,936.

7. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, the Credentials Committee wishes to inform the Conference that there are 49 women among the 556 delegates accredited to the Conference and 213 women among the 1,380 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 262 as against 246 last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

8. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to continue the practice adopted at its 49th Session of fixing the quorum on the basis of the number of delegates registered, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference as to the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

9. At this time the number of registered delegates is 411, comprising 208 Government delegatges, 100 Employers' delegates and 103 Workers' delegates.

10. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 939, comrising 469 Government advisers, 203 Employers' advisers and 267 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

11. Fifty-one advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

12. Since 14 States[1] represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the Organisation, these States, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees. The 34 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. In addition, two registered Workers' delegates are not taken into account in the calculation of the quorum because of the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

14. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 213.

15. The Committee notes that the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates would be 254. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered and that which could have been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation. The Committee stresses, in this connection, the need for the registration of delegates and advisers to commence as early as possible on the morning preceding the opening of the Conference to enable the delegates and advisers concerned to attend their respective pre-Conference group meetings.

[1] Antigua and Barbuda, Cameroon, Comoros, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Guyana, Iraq, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Paraguay, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Yugoslavia.

Incomplete delegations

16. The Committee notes that a certain number of delegations are so far incomplete. The delegations of Cameroon, Chad, Comoros, Equatorial Guinea, Somalia, Viet Nam are exclusively governmental. In addition, five countries (Albania, Kyrgzstan, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Sudan) have not accredited an Employers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

17. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expressed the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

18. Two observer delegations, mentioned in the Brief Report of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, are attending the Conference.

Organisations and liberation movements invited

19. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) – relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialised agencies and other official international organisations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organisation with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organisations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of liberation movements invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

A list these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections[1]

20. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work would be facilitated if the Credentials would reach the Office within the time limit provided for under Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders and if all governments utilised the suggested form for credentials of delegates, enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. It would be particularly helpful if governments would provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organisations which have agreed to such nominations.

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Chairman.

First report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 4 and 8 June 1992 with Mr. Tayo Fashoyin (Nigeria) as Chairman and Reporter, and Mr. W. Dejong (Australia) as Vice-Chairman.

REQUEST OF THE GOVERNMENT OF PARAGUAY, UNDER PARAGRAPH 4 OF ARTICLE 13 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, FOR PERMISSION TO VOTE

2. The Committee had before it a request from the Government of Paraguay for permission to vote at the Conference. This request was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

3. The text of the request, dated 13 May 1992, is as follows:

> (Translated from Spanish)
> The Ministry of Justice and Labour
> ASUNCION
> Paraguay
> 13 May 1992
> Dear Mr. Director-General,
> I have the honour to refer to the arrangement for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due by the Government of Paraguay to the International Labour Organisation that was approved by the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1991, under which Paraguay was due to pay its contribution to the Working Capital Fund of 2,625 Swiss francs plus its assessed contribution for 1991 of 86,741 Swiss francs and an annuity on account of arrears of contributions of 58,738 Swiss francs before 31 December 1991.
> When making payment of the above amounts differences in exchange rates arose between Paraguayan currency and Swiss francs which unfortunately resulted in an amount of 4,687 Swiss francs still being due at the end of 1991, with the result that my country lost the right to vote in the ILO on 1 January 1992. Upon learning of this short payment my Government immediately made arrangements to have the amount paid and it was received by the ILO on 13 January 1992, which represented a delay in the payment of 13 days.
> I would also like to advise you that the Government of Paraguay, despite the economic difficulties that it is facing, has now paid all of the amounts due to be paid in 1992 under the arrangement, together with an amount on account of its 1993 obligations.
>
> In the light of the above and as my country wishes to participate fully in the work of the International Labour Organisation, I would request that you transmit to the International Labour Conference my Government's request that, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the Organisation, Paraguay be again permitted to vote for so long as it makes the payments required by article 32.2 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.
> Yours faithfully,
> (Signed) HUGO ESTIGARRIBIA ELIZECHE.
> Minister

4. The Committee noted that paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides as follows:

> A Member of the Organisation which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organisation shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

5. The Committee also noted that article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides as follows:

> Article 31
> Procedure where a proposal is made to permit a Member in arrears to vote
> 1. Any request or proposal that the Conference should nevertheless permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution shall be referred in the first instance to the Finance Committee of the Conference, which shall report thereon as a matter of urgency.
> 2. Pending a decision on the request or proposal by the Conference, the Member shall not be entitled to vote.
> 3. The Finance Committee shall submit to the Conference a report giving its opinion on the request or proposal.
> 4. If the Finance Committee, having found that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member, thinks fit to propose to the Conference that the Member should nevertheless be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, it shall in its report –
> (a) explain the nature of the conditions beyond the Member's control;
> (b) give an analysis of the financial relations between the Member and the Organisation during the preceding ten years;
> (c) indicate the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears.
> 5. Any decision which may be taken by the Conference to permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote notwithstanding such arrears may be made conditional upon the Member complying with any recommendations for settling the arrears which may be made by the Conference.

6. In examining the financial relations between Paraguay and the Organisation for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that the 78th (June 1991) Session of the Conference adopted an arrangement proposed by the Government of Paraguay for the settlement of arrears of contributions due for the period 1956-90 of 1,174,753 Swiss francs, made up as follows:

7. In addition to the above, Paraguay owed its initial contribution to the Working Capital Fund of the Organisation of 2,625 Swiss francs (originally US$1,500).

8. The terms of the Conference arrangement were:

(a) in 1991 Paraguay would pay in full its contribution for the year 1991, together with its contribution due to the Working Capital Fund of the Organisation of 2,625 Swiss francs;

(b) in subsequent years Paraguay would continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it was due;

(c) Paraguay would settle the arrears that had accumulated up to and including 31 December 1990, amounting in total to 1,174,753 Swiss francs, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of 58,738 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 58,731 Swiss francs, beginning in 1991.

9. By 31 December 1991 Paraguay had paid its contribution to the Working Capital Fund, its annuity against arrears and 82,054 Swiss francs against its 1991 assessed contribution of 86,741 Swiss francs, leaving a shortfall in payments against its 1991 obligations of 4,687 Swiss francs. As a result, on 1 January 1992, the terms of paragraph 2 of article 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference no longer applied to Paraguay and it lost the right to vote in the Organisation.

10. The shortfall in payments in 1991 was covered by an amount received from Paraguay on 13 January 1992. Paraguay has now also paid the total of its obligations for 1992 under the Conference arrangement totalling 153,061 Swiss francs, made up of its 1992 annuity against arrears of 58,738 Swiss francs and its 1992 assessed contribution of 94,323 Swiss francs, and has made an advance payment of 2,094 Swiss francs against its 1993 obligations.

11. The representative of Italy observed that the payment in January had brought Paraguay up to date with its obligations and he supported its request for the right to vote.

12. The representative of Germany asked whether it was technically possible to make a payment for contributions in advance when arrears of contributions were still outstanding.

13. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) said that according to the Financial Regulations payments were applied to the earliest of arrears so in theory it would not be possible to pay contributions in advance if current contributions or arrears were still outstanding. Where there was a formal arrangement for the payment of arrears in instalments, however, it was possible to do so. The amount received for 1993 was applicable to the 1993 annuity against arrears.

14. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Paraguay to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

(a) the Committee finds that the failure of Paraguay to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 3 above;

(b) the financial relations between Paraguay and the Organisation for the preceding ten years have been set out in paragraph 6 above;

(c) the Government of Paraguay has paid the balance of the amounts due in 1991 on 13 January 1992, thus bringing itself up to date within the terms of the arrangement for the settlement of its arrears approved by the 78th (June 1991) Session of the Conference.

15. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Paraguay of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

APPOINTMENTS TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE BOARD (ILO STAFF PENSIONS FUND) AND TO THE ILO STAFF PENSION COMMITTEE (UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION BOARD)

16. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board).

17. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) informed the Committee that the information appendices in Provisional Record No. 5 containing extracts from the reports of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to the Governing Body at its 253rd Session (May-June 1992) did not include the amendments put forward by Committee members when the reports were adopted. Those extracts should therefore be read in conjunction with the amendments contained in documents GB.253/PFA/15 Corr. and GB.253/PFA/16 Corr.

18. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Matters relating to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

A. Statute of the Tribunal

19. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning amendments to the Statute of the Tribunal.

20. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

B. Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

21. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

22. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Assessment of the contributions of the Republic of Korea and of Viet Nam

Republic of Korea

23. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessment of the Republic of Korea for 1991 and 1992.

24. The representative of Australia said that this decision should be only a formality. The matter had already been discussed in the Allocations Committee and the Governing Body so much of this double handling surely was unnecessary.

25. The representative of Korea said that he was happy to accept the rate of assessment proposed by the Allocations Committee but he wished to know to what extent the nationalities of ILO staff were related to assessment rates.

26. The Treasurer confirmed that the Office did maintain a desirable range for the number of professional category officials for each member State, and this range was based on the scale of assessments.

27. The representative of Korea said that his government was firmly committed to the aims and ideals of the ILO but despite requests for representation on the staff there had been no response yet from the Office.

28. At the suggestion of the Chairman it was agreed that this matter should be discussed directly between the Office and the representative of Korea.

29. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Viet Nam

30. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessment of Viet Nam for 1992.

31. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Assessment of the contributions of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia

Scale of assessment of contributions for 1993

32. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5 and document F.C./D.3, containing resolutions submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessment of contributions for each of these member States for its period of membership to the end of 1992. Provisional Record No. 5 also contained a draft scale of assessments of member States' contributions for 1993 as recommended by the Allocations Committee of the Governing Body and endorsed by the Governing Body itself.

33. The Treasurer advised the Committee that ILO assessment rates were based on UN assessment rates, adjusted for differences in membership in the two organisations, and the ILO Allocations Committee would not be in a position to make recommendations on assessment rates for these six member States until UN rates had been fixed by the General Assembly later in 1992. He also advised that amendments were required to paragraph 6 of document F.C./D.3, concerning the terms of the resolution in paragraph 13 (ii). Paragraph (d) should be renumbered (e), and a new paragraph (d) inserted as follows:

> That consideration of the rate of assessment for 1993 for Slovenia be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference;

34. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt these resolutions, the texts of which appear at the end of this report.

The Working Capital Fund

35. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing resolutions submitted by the Governing Body concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund and proposing amendments to the Financial Regulations. Document F.C./D.4, containing details of the shares of member States in Part I of the Working Capital Fund, was also made available.

36. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt these resolutions, the texts of which appear at the end of this report.

FINANCIAL REPORT AND AUDITED FINANCIAL STATEMENTS FOR 1990-91

37. The Committee had before it the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for the Sixty-second Financial Period (1990-91); Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1992-93 and other financial and administrative questions; document GB.253/PFA/2/10, on the follow-up given to the External Auditor's Report on the Accounts for 1988-89; and Provisional Record No. 5, containing a recommendation submitted by the Governing Body that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91.

38. The representative of the United Kingdom, referring to Schedule 3.2 of the Financial Statements, observed that although $1.9 million had been credited to the Voluntary Thrift Benefit Fund no disbursements were shown. Had the Fund begun operating, or were arrangements still to be finalised?

39. The Treasurer replied that the Financial Statements gave the position as at 31 December 1991. The Fund had commenced operation on 1 December 1991, and qualifying officials had until the end of November 1992 to join. So far, 850 had done so. The investment management of the Fund was in the hands of a Geneva private bank, Lombard Odier and Co., and the accounting records were kept by the Epargne de France.

40. The representative of Switzerland attached great importance to the work of the External Auditor and expressed appreciation for the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee document GB.253/PFA/2/10, dealing with the follow-up given to the External Auditor's Report on the Accounts for 1988-89. It was reassuring to see the extent to which the External Auditor's recommendations had been put into effect and she supported the views expressed in the document that follow-up action should be reported regularly.

41. The representative of the United Kingdom asked whether the Office could report at some stage in future, possibly in November or after membership of the Voluntary Thrift Benefit Fund was closed, on the operation of the Fund and whether the full payment of $4,875,000 from the ILO as approved by the Conference in 1991 would be required.

42. The Treasurer replied that about 30 per cent of the ILO staff had already become members of the Fund. A further progress report could be given at the November 1992 Session of the Governing Body.

43. The representative of Ireland was impressed by the extent to which the Office had followed up on the External Auditor's Report for 1998-89 and was pleased to see that this matter would be reported in future in the year following the adoption of the Accounts.

44. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations, and accordingly that it adopt the resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

TREATMENT OF 1990-91 CASH SURPLUS

45. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the cash surplus for the 1990-91 biennium.

46. The representative of Sao Tome and Principe observed that a waiver was required to article 18 of the Financial Regulations to use part of the cash surplus to pay for what was really routine expenditure. This expenditure should be provided for as part of the normal budgetary process, not through waivers to the Financial Regulations.

47. The representative of the Russian Federation reiterated his statement made during discussion in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, where he had expressed strong agreement with the views put forward by the representative of the Government of Germany in favour of the strict application of article 18 of the Financial Regulations. Certainly provision should be made for the replacement of office equipment but it would be logical to provide the necessary money through the budget. Even though good reasons had been put forward he was not happy with the proposal to use part of the cash surplus for this purpose, but he would not hinder the adoption of the proposal on this occasion.

48. The Treasurer agreed that it would be preferable to budget for the purchase of equipment by making appropriate provisions in the Programme and Budget. With the constraints of zero real growth this was not a realistic approach as it would be difficult to cut programme items in order to accommodate equipment needs. However, if a more flexible approach to zero growth were adopted, whereby the actual programme level would remain constant but exceptional investment needs were examined on their merits outside the zero growth calculation, this would be clearly desirable. He added that the Director-General, in his Introduction to the Programme and Budget Proposals for 1992-93, had mentioned the need to set up an equipment investment fund which would be financed through contributions from the regular budget and used to meet costly equipment purchases. So far it had not been possible to retain such a proposal in the Programme and Budget.

49. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that she had been extremely reluctant to accept this proposal when it was discussed in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee. Although not wanting to reopen the matter now she still had serious misgivings about the way a decision had been taken on a proposal for expenditure of this magnitude. The 10 million Swiss francs requested for equipment purchases was over five times the budgetary provision in 1990-91 or in 1992-93 and should have been subject to a proper cost-justification exercise. Admittedly, the Organisation had been forced to follow a zero growth regime in recent years, but it was not clear whether expenditure on equipment really had been cut in the past. It would be useful to know under what headings it would have been budgeted, had it been possible to include it in the Programme and Budget. There were a number of other matters which needed to be examined in more detail. For instance, in respect of the proposed purchase of an electronic voting system, had the Office explored the possibility of using other conference facilities in Geneva, where such a system might already be available, and which might cost less than the $250,000 annual charge for facilities at the Palais? ? Turning to the operation of the Building and Accommodation Fund, Schedule 3.2 of the 1990-91 Audited Financial Statements showed income to the Fund of almost $2 million and a balance at 31 December 1991 of over $3 million even though there were a number of outstanding commitments to be charged against this amount; it would be useful to have more detail on this expenditure and the efforts being made by the Office to maximise income by renting out facilities or office space such as that vacated recently by the WHO.

50. The representative of France pointed out that these proposals had already been discussed in great detail in the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and although not wishing to inhibit those who had not yet had an opportunity to comment he hoped that all the earlier discussion would not be repeated.

51. The representative of Switzerland observed that the information in the document before the Committee and the discussion so far raised serious questions about how the compromise was reached. From the views expressed it seemed to be weighted too heavily one way to be a genuine compromise.

52. The Treasurer, replying to the questions raised, explained that under the very hypothetical case of provision being made for the proposed equipment through normal budgeting procedures, the resources for the electronic voting system would be budgeted for under major programme 10, the central word-processing system under major programme 180, the replacement of audio systems under either major programme 220 or major programme 170. He hoped that the Committee did not have the erroneous impression that the capital expenditure being proposed now was in order to compensate for equivalent amounts being subject to budgetary cuts in past biennia. He recalled that, despite the very large shortfalls in income in the 1986-87 and 1988-89 biennia, the Director-General had reduced expenditure to live within the income available, with the result that no assessment was made on member States to compensate for the shortfalls. The budgetary cuts that had been made related to the postponement or deletion of programme work items and did not necessarily relate to reductions in the credits for the purchase of equipment, which were already modest. It was the considered view of the Director-General that the cash surplus that had now resulted would be profitably used to invest in modern technology and equipment in order to enhance productivity and efficiency.

53. The Treasurer confirmed that the Office had indeed investigated the possibility of holding the Conference, or at least some of its Committee meetings, in other locations in Geneva because of the pressure of accommodation in the Palais des Nations. The Conference Centre in Vermont had been considered, but the assembly hall could not accommodate the needs of the Conference. Moreover, the electronic voting system required by the ILO was more complex because the tripartite structure required four separate votes per delegation. He assured the Committee that the Office made every effort to maximise its income from the rental of office accommodation and meeting rooms; unfortunately, recent negotiations with a neighbouring organisation had not materialised in an agreement.

54. The representative of Switzerland again questioned whether a real consensus on the compromise had been reached. While the debate had centred on the equal distribution of the 4 million Swiss francs originally allocated to the Building and Accommodation Fund, the figures showed that the money to be reimbursed from the cash surplus to member States was only 7 million Swiss francs while the Organisation retained 12 million Swiss francs. A compromise should satisfy all the parties concerned. It would appear that in this case it was weighted in favour of the Office and did not take into account the reservations expressed by some of the Committee members.

55. The representative of France explained that as Chairman of the Governing Body and of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee he had presided over the discussion on this item the previous week and he recalled the steps by which the compromise had been reached. The first compromise suggested, whereby the full 4 million Swiss francs proposed for transfer to the Building and Accommodation Fund would be added to the cash surplus for distribution to member States, had not been accepted by the Employer and Worker members. A new compromise was proposed and eventually accepted whereby 2 million Swiss francs of the 4 million Swiss francs originally proposed for the Building and Accommodation Fund would be reimbursed to member States and the remaining 2 million Swiss francs transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund.

56. The representative of the United Kingdom reaffirmed her agreement to the compromise reached during the May meeting of the Programme, Finance and Administrative Committee. Despite the fact that the implications of this transfer had been discussed, it was proper that this Committee have the opportunity to discuss these issues further.

57. Although the transfer of 2 million Swiss francs had been agreed to, it was not clear how that money would be spent. Previous budgets did not show any pattern in expenditure from the Building and Accommodation Fund. Nor was it obvious how the fund operated, where the income came from, or what expenditure was made from it. There were a number of existing programmes from which equipment was financed, such as Major Programme 170 which covered expenditure on regular maintenance of the Office's building. Did this imply that the Building and Accommodation Fund financed unanticipated maintenance? She asked the Office to prepare an information document which would explain the operation of the Building and Accommodation Fund for the November session of the Governing Body.

58. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) said it was extremely difficult to forecast rental income, which was paid into the Building and Accommodation Fund. Although Major Programme 170 covered expenditure on regular maintenance, major repairs were normally financed from the Building and Accommodation Fund, but with the prior approval of the Governing Body. The Office would prepare a paper describing the operation of the Fund for the next session of the Governing Body.

59. The representative of Korea said that even if a compromise had been agreed upon, it was this Committee that made the final decision and therefore it was appropriate that any doubts or questions be discussed during this Committee. In regard to the difficulty of accommodating delegates in the plenary sessions, he wondered whether the problem might be overcome by a more flexible arrangement for the allocation of seats.

60. The representative of India believed that although the Committee could deal with matters of detail, it was equally important that discussion did not become bogged down. He endorsed the transfer of 2 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund, and noted that the Director-General would make specific proposals on a case by case basis for expenditure from this Fund. The Fund was not large enough to warrant detailed guidelines, and the fact that all proposals were approved by the Governing Body should provide an adequate safeguard on how it was used.

61. The representative of the United States felt that this Committee was the proper forum for debate on financial issues. In congratulating the Chairman of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee on the way the debate was handled on the cash surplus, he had been prepared to agree to the compromise reached even though he was not very happy with it. Extended debate was very useful on complex issues and in the last year or so, as a result of detailed discussions, many members of this Committee were much more knowledgeable now on matters concerning the Terminal Benefits Fund, the lapse factor and the Building and Accommodation Fund. Detailed discussions were all the more necessary at a time of zero real growth when difficult decisions had to be made to maintain an equitable balance between programme and capital expenditure.

62. The representative of the United Kingdom endorsed the statement made by the representative of the United States. Over the years many issues had been highlighted in the Finance Committee which otherwise the Governing Body would not have examined. The Building and Accommodation Fund needed further scrutiny and the discussion on it should be continued at the November session of the Governing Body.

63. In the 1992-93 Programme and Budget it was agreed to allocate approximately 200,000 US dollars "to ensure that total income to the Fund, comprising both income from rental revenue and regular budget contributions, is adequate to meet the cost of certain major repairs". It was legitimate to question why, within one year, the provision needed to be raised to 2 million dollars. Essential work obviously had to be carried out, but, as a matter of principle, the Office should present detailed costings and arguments to justify its requests for more money.

64. The representative of Australia supported the request made by the previous speaker for more information.

65. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

APPENDICES

66. A table showing the contributions due from member States for 1993 is appended to this report (Appendix I). The credit in respect of cash surpluses for previous periods, totalling SF 4,083,805 is made up of SF 2,506 for Paraguay in respect of the years 1957, 1959 and 1960, and SF 4,081,299 in respect of the 1990-91 financial period. Under article 18 of the Financial Regulations only those member States which have paid their 1990-91 contributions in full are entitled to have their share of the 1990-91 cash surplus deducted from their 1993 contributions. Other member States will be entitled to their share of the surplus when their contributions for 1990-91 are paid in full.

67. A statement of appropriations from the 1990-91 cash surplus is also appended to this report (Appendix II), as is a statement showing the draft amendments to the Financial Regulations (Appendix III).

Geneva, June 1992

(Signed) T. FASHOYIN,
Chairman and Reporter

Resolution concerning the granting to Paraguay of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having regard to the terms of the financial arrangement adopted by the Conference at its 78th (1991) Session for the settlement of the arrears of Paraguay,

Having regard further to the fact that Paraguay has brought itself up to date within the terms of the financial arrangement by payment of the balance of the amounts due in 1991 on 13 January 1992;

Decides that Paraguay be permitted to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

Resolution concerning appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pensions Board)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Appoints to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund), for a period of three years until 8 October 1995, the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely:

Members: Mr. Y. Chotard (France)
Miss A. M. Mackie (United Kingdom)
Mr. R. Vanni (Italy)

Substitute members: Mr. D. Pelekanos (Cyprus)
Mr. R. M. Schibli (Switzerland)
Mr. W. M. Yoffee (United States).

Resolution concerning the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides:

(a) to amend article III, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation to read as follows:

> The Tribunal shall consist of [three judges and four deputy] seven judges, who shall all be of different nationalities;

(b) to delete the words "and deputy judges" from article III, paragraph 2;

(c) to amend article III, paragraph 4, as follows:

> A meeting of the Tribunal shall be composed of three members [, of whom one at least must be a judge] or, in exceptional cases, five, or seven, to be designated by the President.

(d) to delete (as being no longer relevant) article III, paragraph 3, of the Statute which reads as follows:

> The terms of office of the judges and deputy judges who were in office on 1 January 1940 are prolonged until 1 April 1947 and thereafter until otherwise decided by the appropriate organ of the International Labour Organisation. Any vacancy which occurs during the period in question shall be filled by the said organ.

Resolution concerning of the composition of the Adminsitrative Tribunal of the ILO

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides to appoint as judge of the Administrative Tribunal, for a term of three years, with effect from 18 November 1992:

Mr. Michel Gentot (France),

Decides to appoint as judge of the Administrative Tribunal, for a term of three years and with immediate effect:

Mr. Mark Fernando (Sri Lanka).

Decides to extend the term of office of Mr. Pierre Pescatore by a further period of three years.

Declares that, as from the adoption by the Conference of the proposed amendment to article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal repealing the distinction between judges and deputy judges, all deputy judges in office will be considered as judges for the remaining part of their term of office.

Resolution concerning the contributions of the Republic of Korea

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for the period of its membership in 1991 an annual assessment rate of 0.68 per cent for the contribution of the Republic of Korea to the 1990-91 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation;

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for 1992 an annual assessment rate of 0.68 per cent for the contribution of the Republic of Korea to the 1992-93 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation.

Resolution concerning the contributions of Viet Nam

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

In accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, fixes for 1992 an annual rate of 0.01 per cent for the contribution of Viet Nam to the 1992-93 Programme and Budget of the International Labour Organisation.

Resolutions concerning the contributions of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia, and the scale of assessment of contributions for 1993

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Following the practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations,

Noting that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia in the United Nations for their periods of membership in the United Nations in 1991 and 1992 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992;

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that consideration of the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia for their periods of membership in the Organisation in 1991 and 1992, together with those of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-94 United Nations scale of assessments, be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Following the practice of harmonising the rates of assessment of ILO member States with their rates of assessment in the United Nations,

Noting that the assessment rates of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia in the United Nations scale of assessments for the years 1992, 1993 and 1994 will not be approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations until later in 1992;

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations:

(a) to adopt the draft scale of assessments for 1993 as set out in column 1 of Appendix I to this document;

(b) that the rates of assessment of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania for 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(c) that the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other States which formed part of the former USSR and may become Members of the ILO before 1 January 1993 be the same as the rates at which they would be assessed for 1993 in the United Nations, and that the total of their rates of assessment be deducted from the rate of assessment of the Russian Federation in the draft scale;

(d) that consideration of the rate of assessment in 1993 for Slovenia be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference;

(e) that consideration of the rates of assessment for 1993 of any other new member States for which rates of assessment have not been established in the 1992-1994 United Nations scale of assessments be deferred to the 80th (June 1993) Session of the International Labour Conference.

Resolutions concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund and proposals to amend the Financial Regulations

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Decides that, in accordance with article 19, paragraphs 2 (a) and 4, of the Financial Regulations, the amounts standing to the credit of member States in Part I of the Working Capital Fund on 31 December 1991 shall be liberated and applied to reduce regular budget contributions payable by member States for 1993, without prejudice to the amendment of the Financial Regulations referred to in the following resolution;

Decides that interest accruing for the year ended 31 December 1992 on the amount so liberated shall be credited to the Working Capital Fund.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling that, at the 248th (November 1990) Session of the Governing Body, the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee had set up a Working Party to review the current arrangements governing the Working Capital Fund,

Recognising that amendments to the Financial Regulations are required in order to implement the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund,

Recalling that the 78th (1991) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that amendments to the Financial Regulations required to establish the incentive scheme for early payment of member States' assessed contributions would be introduced at the same time,

Recognising that the 77th (1990) Session of the International Labour Conference decided that one-half of any net premium earned for a biennium on forward purchasing transactions between US dollars and Swiss francs should be distributed to the Incentive Fund, but did not define specific criteria for the distribution of this half of the net premium to member States;

Decides to approve in principle the amendments set out in Appendix III, on the understanding that it will be for the Governing Body, after having had an opportunity to consider more closely at its next session their possible interrelationships with other amendments and proposals still pending, to bring them into effect definitively as from 1 January 1993, and to make proposals for any amendments as may appear appropriate.

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation;

Decides to adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations.

Resolution concerning the treatment of the 1990-91 cash surplus

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that for the 1990-91 biennium an excess of regular budget income over regular budget expenditure has resulted in a cash surplus of 19,369,458 Swiss francs;

1. Decides, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, to set aside 10,324,000 Swiss francs of the 1990-91

cash surplus in a special account, to be used for the purpose of financing the purchases of capital equipment itemised in Appendix II to this report, and 2 million Swiss francs to be transferred to the Building and Accommodation Fund, thereby reducing by corresponding amounts the sum which would otherwise be available for reducing member States' assessed contributions for 1993.

2. Notes that, taking account of the above appropriations, the amount available under article 18 of the Financial Regulations for reducing the assessed contributions of member States for 1993 will be 7,045,458 Swiss francs.

Article 11

4. The Director-General shall set aside in an Incentive Fund to encourage early payment of member States' assessed contributions 60 per cent of all interest earned on temporarily surplus regular budget funds in any year for distribution to those member States which have paid in full their assessed contributions by 31 December of that year. The total incentive amount so established in each year will be distributed to eligible member States under an incentive points system which takes into account the dates and amounts of payments of current year's contributions by member States.

5. The Director-General shall distribute any net premium earned on the forward purchasing transactions between US dollars and Swiss francs during a biennium under the Swiss franc assessment system in the following manner: one-half to the Incentive Fund referred to in paragraph 4 above in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 6 below and one-half to member States in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 7 below; the net premium earned being arrived at after allowing for any residual gain or loss on exchange in the same biennium arising from the operation of the Swiss franc assessment system.

6. The one-half share of any net premium distributed to the Incentive Fund shall be credited to those member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full at the end of either the first or second year of the financial period during which the net premium was earned and shall be distributed to each eligible member State in the second year of the next following financial period on the basis of the ratio of the total of the incentive points earned by it during the biennium to the total of the incentive points earned by all eligible member States during the biennium under the incentive points system mentioned in paragraph 4 above.

7. The one-half share of any net premium distributed to member States shall be apportioned among them on the basis of the proportion of the total of each member State's assessed contributions during the biennium in which the net premium was earned to the total of the assessed contributions for the biennium of all member States. The amounts so established shall be used to reduce the contributions of member States in the following way:

(a) member States which have paid their assessed contributions in full during the biennium in which the net premium was earned shall have their share of the net premium deducted from their contributions assessed for the second year of the succeeding biennium;

(b) other member States shall not be credited with their share of the net premium until they have paid in full their assessed contributions for the biennium in which the net premium was earned; when they have done so, their share of the net premium shall be deducted from their contributions assessed for the first year of the next biennium for which a budget is adopted after such payment.

Article 19

[2. The Working Capital Fund shall be of such amount as may be voted from time to time by the Conference and shall be constituted by:

(a) moneys placed in the Fund by the Members of the Organisation, the amount of the share of each Member being assessed in accordance with the budgetary scale of contributions; and

(b) any sums which the Conference may cause to be paid into it from time to time.

3. The sums paid by Members of the Organisation under paragraph 2(a) for the purpose of constituting or augmenting the Working Capital Fund shall be carried to the credit of the Members which have paid such sums. The sums which the Conference causes to be paid into the Fund from time to time shall be carried to the credit of the Organisation.

4. The Conference may liberate all or part of the sums constituting the Working Capital Fund, and the sums so liberated in so far as they are derived from moneys placed in the Fund under paragraph 2(a) shall be returned to the Members which have contributed to the Fund in proportion to the respective shares in the Fund.

5. Subject to a decision of the Conference, States which for any reason cease to be Members of the Organisation shall be entitled to the reimbursement of the total amount of their shares in the Working Capital Fund under paragraph 2(a).

6. Members joining the Organisation shall contribute to the Working Capital Fund even if such payments would bring the Working Capital Fund above a maximum limit fixed for it by the Conference, provided that the position with regard to the Fund shall be reviewed by the Conference from time to time with a view to determining what adjustment, if any, should be made in the amount of the Fund, having regard to consequent excess over the maximum limit.]

1. The Working Capital Fund shall be administered as a separate account. A statement showing the position of the Fund, audited by the external auditor, shall be submitted to the session of the Conference following the close of each financial period. [Payments into the Fund under article 19, paragraph 2(a), shall be made from the budget. As soon as a Member pays its contribution the Working Capital Fund account shall be immediately credited with a portion of the contributions corresponding to the ratio between the appropriation in respect of the Working Capital Fund for the financial period and the total appropriations for the financial period.]

1. (a) Sums [not exceeding the total shares in the Fund of the Members of the Organisation] may be withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund to finance budgetary expenditure for any [calendar year] financial period pending receipt of contributions or other income, and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body, and shall be reimbursed to the Fund in the course of the same [year] financial period as soon as income from contributions or other income is available for this purpose.

(b) Should the [sums contributed to the] Working Capital Fund [by Members] be temporarily inadequate to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body, [advances may be made from that part of the Working Capital Fund which stands to the credit of the Organisation. Such advances shall be reimbursed to the Fund as soon as receipts from contributions or other income are available. Such advances shall also be reported to the Governing Body at the session following the making of an advance. Should the Working Capital Fund as a whole be temporarily inadequate to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body.] the Director-General may contract loans or advances for such sums as may be necessary pending the receipt of contributions. The amounts borrowed shall be reimbursed as soon as possible from the subsequent receipts of contributions or other income. Such borrowings shall be reported to the Governing Body at the session following the contracting of a loan or advance.

2. If [in] any [calendar year] sums withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund or borrowed to finance budgetary expenditure pending receipt of contributions or other income and/or expenditure incurred in the financing of contingencies and emergencies under prior authorisation of the Governing Body cannot be reimbursed in the course of the same [year] financial period owing to the fact that the total budgetary income for [that year] the period falls short of total authorised expenditure incurred during the [year] period, the sums so borrowed or withdrawn shall be reimbursed to the lender or lenders and to the Fund in the second year of the next following [the year of such withdrawal] financial period by adding to the contributions assessed on member States for that year an additional assessment in Swiss francs equivalent to the amount so borrowed or withdrawn: provided that temporary surpluses of budgetary income over expenditure occurring at any time shall be utilised to the extent possible to reduce the amount of outstanding loans or advances.

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

ADMISSION OF MOLDAVIA TO MEMBERSHIP OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT : I have the pleasure to announce that the Republic of Moldavia has just been admitted as a new member State of the International Labour Organisation. According to Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, all of the obligations resulting from the Constitution have been accepted by Moldavia and I would like to congratulate and welcome Moldavia to the International Organisation.

COMMUNICATIONS TO THE CONFERENCE

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – The Conference has received three letters concerning Yugoslavia, one from the Permanent Mission of Australia, one from the Permanent Mission of the United States, and one from the Government of the Republic of Slovenia. I will now read these letters.

The letter from the Permanent Mission of Australia reads as follows:

Dear Mr. President,

I am writing on behalf of the Australian Government delegation to the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, and would be grateful if the contents of this letter could be brought to the attention of the Conference.

Australia has taken note of the 27 April 1992 Proclamation of the establishment of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by the Republics of Montenegro and Serbia, two of the six republics of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Australia is considering the effect of this Proclamation.

Australia wishes to place on record its view that the current participation of representatives of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in meetings of international organisations is without prejudice to the eventual resolution of the question of the status of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

(Signed) Bill BARKER,
Acting Permanent Representative of the Australian Permanent Mission in Geneva

I will now read the second letter, from the United States Mission in Geneva:

Dear Mr. President,

The United States firmly believes that the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia no longer exists. Furthermore, we do not consider Serbia-Montenegro to be the continuation of, or sole successor to, the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Accordingly, the position of the United States is that Serbia-Montenegro is not entitled to assume the seat of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the United Nations system, including the International Labour Organisation.

However, the United States also believes that the United Nations Security Council and General Assembly are the appropriate bodies to resolve the issue of the membership of Serbia-Montenegro in the United Nations.

I would be grateful if you would bring the contents of this letter to the attention of the Conference and have it published in the Record of the Conference.

(Signed) Anthony FREEMAN,
United States Government delegate to the International Labour
Conference

I will now read the third letter, from the Government of the Republic of Slovenia, dated 8 June 1992.

Mr. President,

The Government of the Republic of Slovenia took note of the declaration made on 27 April 1992 on behalf of the Republic of Montenegro and the Republic of Serbia, informing of the decision of the Assembly of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to promulgate the Constitution of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, thereby transforming the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY), a former federation of the Republics of Bosnia and Hercegovina, Croatia, Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia and Slovenia and the autonomous provinces of Kossovo and Vojvodina, into the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY), consisting of the Republic of Serbia and the Republic of Montenegro. Under the said Constitution, the FRY, strictly respecting the continuity of the international personality of the former SFRY, should continue to fulfil all the rights conferred on and obligations assumed by the former SFRY in international relations, including its membership in all international organisations and participation in international treaties ratified or acceded to by the former SFRY.

In this connection the Government of the Republic of Slovenia would like to draw your attention to the fact that, on 27 April 1992, the Assembly of the former SFRY could not take legally valid decisions, since at that time only two of the six republics of the former SFRY were still represented in it.

The very issue of succession of international personality of the former SFRY had been previously transferred to the Brussels Conference on Yugoslavia, an international forum agreed upon by all six republics of the former SFRY.

The Governments of the other four Republics of the former SFRY, while not questioning the legitimate right of the Republic of Montenegro and Republic of Serbia to form a new Federation, have objected to the unilateral, automatic and exclusive succession of international personality of the former SFRY by the newly established Federation of the Republic of Montenegro and the Republic of Serbia, since they deem that each Republic of the former SFRY has equal right to succession of international personality of the former SFRY. It goes without saying that the prospective successors should also strictly fulfil all obligations assumed by the former SFRY.

The Government of the Republic of Slovenia is exerting immense efforts to restore peace in the region and to resolve issues of succession of international personality of the former SFRY within the international forum agreed upon by all parties involved, while scrupulously respecting all the international obligations assumed by the former SFRY.

The Government of the Republic of Slovenia regrets that despite its utmost efforts, as well as those of the family of nations at large, many fundamental international obligations and commitments assumed by the former SFRY are still not being respected, that peace has not yet been restored, and that the issue of succession of international personality of the former SFRY has not yet been agreed upon in the jointly agreed forum.

Consequently, the Government of the Republic of Slovenia has to maintain its objection to automatic succession of international personality of the former SFRY by the Federation of the Republic of Montenegro and the Republic of Serbia, and reserves its position regarding representation in international organisations, including the International Labour Organisation.

I would appreciate if you could present the views of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia to the Conference.

Please accept, Mr. President, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Jozica PUHAR,
Minister of Labour.

THIRD REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda today is the third report of the Selection Committee, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 6B. So I would now like to present this report to you for adoption. If there are no objections I take it as adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We will now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-FAYEZ (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate!

May I start by congratulating – on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia – Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to congratulate the countries that have joined the ILO ranks; they will help to strengthen the membership of the Organisation so that it may fulfil its objectives and consolidate social justice.

The theme of the Report of the Director-General this year, Democratisation and the ILO, is most appropriate in view of the present situation and the changes occurring at this moment throughout the world – where the systems in place were incapable of fulfilling the aspirations of their peoples.

Democracy is not a new notion in Saudi Arabia. Succeeding generations have been experiencing this democracy which is guaranteed by our religion, Islam, of which human dignity is one of the cornerstones. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia adopted Islam by conviction and as legislation, since its main objectives are to ensure progress and development to facilitate the life of citizens and to guarantee their interests – while also respecting the principle of dialogue. Our admiration for Islam can only be greater when we realise that this dialogue was not attained through demonstration and claims or as a result of political social awareness on the part of today's society.

The Islamic shari'a considers social values such as justice, freedom and dignity to be essential aims.

According to the shari'a, justice implies justice in words, in work, in behaviour with others and in judgement. The Islamic shari'a guarantees justice and therefore does not heed injustice in any form.

The dignity of man, from his birth until his death, has been taken into account in all the provisions of the shari'a. This also applies to solidarity; the shari'a makes this an obligation for State and for society, which are bound to fulfil man's basic needs – even to help families meet their expenses, either by the zakat (tithe) or by state resources.

The Islamic shari'a is also concerned with brotherhood and bans any forms of discrimination between men. It reminds both men and women that they are equal; the only factor differentiating them is their faith.

Saudi Arabia has made the Islamic shari'a its constitution. The shari'a which contains all rules vital to mankind's happiness, covers all persons, groups and countries without distinction. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia was inspired by the shari'a and divine light to introduce three systems: the basic system of Government; the consultative assembly; and the system of provinces.

The basic government system defines the nature of the state, its objectives and responsibilities and determines the relations between governments and their subjects. It is based on fraternity, dialogue and cooperation; it guarantees the interests of the homeland and its citizens; it upholds basic and inalienable human liberties; and establishes the economic, social and cultural rights of all persons without discrimination.

The system of the consultative assembly, based on the principles of Islam, is used to draw up an overall economic and social development programme and to examine legislation, regulations and international instruments – which can only be amended if the assembly so decides.

During the past ten years, Saudi Arabia has undergone a remarkable transformation in various areas. This has prompted the need to overhaul the kingdom's general administrative system; hence the introduction of the system of provinces, which increases the administration's efficiency and steps up growth in all the provinces of the kingdom. This system also helps to guarantee the rights and freedoms of citizens and to preserve security and public order whilst complying with the shari'a.

These three systems were not adopted to fill a void but to consolidate a system that had been in force for a long time. Justice, equality, freedom and prosperity, common to all the citizens and residents in our country, are the result of the application of the principle of social justice in accordance with the principles of Islam.

The Government of the Kingdom believes that, as part of the country's overall rebirth, human resources development must be one of its main targets because it is vital for development. It is for this reason that the Government has set up thousands of schools in various regions of the Kingdom; higher education has grown rapidly and, at present, there are seven universities and dozens of faculties, not counting the state-funded scholarship programmes abroad. The Government pays particular attention to technical and vocational training; it has set up many training centres as well as trade, industrial, agricultural and technical institutes.

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is proud of the fact that education is free at all levels – as is school equipment. Furthermore, every student at a higher educational establishment or at a technical or vocational training school is paid a monthly grant.

As regards social welfare, the Kingdom applies a policy of social services based on the principle of social solidarity to help the poor, the elderly, the handicapped, orphans and the disabled. Specialised institutions have been set up throughout the kingdom to provide care for these disadvantaged categories; furthermore, pensions and financial grants are provided to families in case of need. The Government also encourages the establishment of cooperative and charity associations by providing them with the necessary assistance.

What is more, major projects have been carried out in such sectors as the health sector, housing, the agricultural and industrial sectors, the energy sector, the desalination of sea water and telecommunications. The state provides unlimited assistance and support to sectors producing basic foodstuffs, medicine and electricity. There can be no more blatant proof of this than the Government's decision, two months ago, to cut the prices of basic commodities and services such as electricity, the telephone and water, fuel – cuts which are not merely restricted to Saudi citizens but to all those residing in the territory of the Kingdom. This proves, if this were necessary, the concern of the Government of the Servant of the Two Mosques to provide citizens and foreigners residing in the kingdom with rest and well-being.

As regards the Kingdom's contribution to the world's welfare, the OECD report for 1991 points out that in 1990, the Kingdom was still at the head of all countries throughout the world as regards assistance provided to developing countries in relation to their GNP; this is tantamount to 11 times the assistance provided by industrialised countries in relation to their GNP.

Several months ago, the Kingdom cancelled the official debts owed to it by a number of developing countries – particularly the least advantaged amongst them.

The Kingdom's development programmes have helped to provide job possibilities to all its citizens as well as to hundreds of thousands of workers from brother countries from various parts of the world. It is relevant to point out that they pay no income tax on their wages and that foreign workers have the same access to benefits as nationals. It goes without saying that all workers in my country work in conditions of stability and tranquility in accordance with a labour code inspired by the tolerant shari'a which makes no distinction between Saudi and foreign workers who are all equal before the law without any distinction. Under the Kingdom's legislation, furthermore, all foreign workers are authorised to transfer their savings to their countries of origin freely and without restrictions.

The agenda of the present session contains many technical items and I firmly hope that our discussions will be conducted objectively and fairly because account must be taken of the economic and social differences of the member States. Indeed, what might be easily applied in one country might be difficult or impossible to apply in another.

The Governing Body and the Director-General have wisely decided to devote a special session to Palestine at this Conference, which reflects the position of this Organisation towards the suffering of the Palestinian people in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories. We are counting upon the solidarity of the various parties at this Conference to decide upon strong measures to guarantee Palestinian workers in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories an honourable and dignified life.

I wish this Conference every success in its work. May the peace and grace of God be with you.

Original – Chinese: Mr. WANG (Workers' delegate, China) – May I begin by extending my warm congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. My heartfelt congratulations also go to the three Vice-Presidents of this Session. I am sure that under your wise guidance this Session of the Conference will be crowned with a positive result and success.

In the past few years, the world situation has undergone drastic changes. The old world order has come to an end and a new one has yet to take shape. As the Director-General's Report points out, a very important question at this historic juncture is how to attain more democracy and more social justice. That is indeed a very important question.

Chinese workers and trade unions have stood consistently in the forefront of the fight for democracy and social justice, and they have waged protracted and persistent struggles to that end. Back in the early 1920s, Chinese workers, who then emerged on the historical stage as a separate class, adopted the slogan, "Fight for democracy and for human rights". To do so they established in 1925 an organisation of their own, the All-China Federation of Trade Unions. Together with the Chinese people, they carried on wave upon wave of heroic struggle, and finally won the victory of democratic revolution, thereby bringing a century-old painful history to an end. During that time, colonialists and imperialists conspired with feudal rulers to enslave the Chinese workers and people.

The founding of the People's Republic of China (PRC) opened a new chapter in the history of China. The Constitution of the PRC explicitly stipulates that "All power in the People's Republic of China belongs to the people". It also provides that the working class is the leading class of the country.

Since the founding of the new China, Chinese workers have become masters of the country, enjoying extensive democratic rights.

The Chinese trade unions are mass organisations formed by the working class on a voluntary basis. They are an important channel for democracy in state, social and political life.

When China initiated a policy of reform and began to open up to the outside world in 1978, the Ninth National Congress of Chinese Trade Unions held at that time pledged to become a model of democracy. Through their representatives at the people's congresses and political consultative conferences (and other bodies) at various levels, they present the opinions and demands of the workers, and participate in the administration of state and social affairs. They are actively involved in the formulation of plans for national, economic and social development, policies, laws, decrees and regulations affecting workers interests and reform programmes which have a bearing on the interests of hundreds of millions in the labour force.

Chinese trade unions pay special attention to democracy at the grass-roots level. It was the trade unions that initiated the establishment of the system of workers' congresses in enterprises, and it was they that energetically pushed for them to be incorporated in legislation concerning enterprises, thus giving them a definite legal status. The workers' congresses are the basic form of democratic management in Chinese enterprises and are the bodies used by the workers to exercise their powers in this respect.

Representatives to the workers' congresses are elected by the workers. The trade union committees serve as their working bodies, and the congresses enjoy a wide range of rights in accordance with the law: first, the right to deliberate on major issues related to the production and management of the enterprise and questions related to technology; second, the right to agree or veto the income distribution plans, which directly affect the interests of workers and staff members; third, the right to decide on matters affecting the welfare of the workers and staff members; and, fourth, the right to supervise and evaluate the work of administrative officials at different levels of the enterprise, as well to make proposals to reward, punish, appoint or remove them. Chinese trade unions always consider the smooth functioning and improvement of the worker's congresses system as one of their main tasks.

At this point, this system has been put into effect by most enterprises. Last year, workers' congresses in enterprises considered a total of 2.745 million important policy matters, approving 2.02 million of them and vetoing 446,000. Grass-roots democracy is of immediate interest to the workers. It is the workers' congresses that make the workers feel like true masters of their enterprises and of the country, and it is the workers' congresses that enable the trade unions to defend the rights and interests of the workers at higher levels more effectively. With the progress made in the construction of socialist democracy and advances in the country's legal system, Chinese trade unions have gained more powers. Recently the Trade Union Act of the People's Republic of China was adopted at the Fifth Session of the Seventh National People's Congress, the Chinese Parliament. This important law is an amendment to the Workers' Organisations Act of 1950. Chinese trade unions actively participated in its preparation. The law more clearly defines the nature, status and tasks of trade unions. It defines the right of trade unions to represent and organise workers and to participate in the administration of state and social affairs and in the management of the enterprises. It extends the right of trade unions to safeguard the rights and interests of the workers, and it provides for the right of trade unions to supervise and participate in a number of matters concerning the interests of the workers. I think this demonstrates that new democratic progress has been made in China and in its legal system, and that this is a concrete reflection of the trade unions' consistent efforts to ensure and to develop democracy.

Chinese workers enjoy extensive democracy and democratic rights, and this has encouraged their initiative and creativity in building up their country and boosting economic development. In the 1980s the country's gross national product grew at an average annual rate of 9 per cent, and the real consumption level grew at an average annual rate of 5.8 per cent. We have thus been able to provide enough food and clothing for our population of 1.1 billion. I think this once again demonstrates that the type of democracy practised in any country must conform with that country's historical, social, economic and cultural realities, and only then can it be possible to encourage the development of the economy and to improved the livelihood of its people. The Chinese type of socialist democracy is in keeping with the aspirations of the Chinese workers and people. The Chinese workers and trade unions understand full well that China is still a developing country, lagging behind economically and culturally. They understand that it is still plagued by a low level of development and that in many respects democracy has to be improved. For the workers and people of China, the continued strengthening and improvement of democracy and the country's legal system is thus a long-term task of historic importance, geared to the attainment of the ultimate objective, a better and more advanced socialist democracy.

The International Labour Organisation is a universal and tripartite organisation. It is its inescapable duty to support the workers of the entire world in their struggle for democracy and social justice. Here, I would like to offer two proposals.

First, at present unemployment and poverty still plague the workers of many countries, and particularly the developing countries. To change this situation is an urgent task for the world of labour and the world as a whole. The promotion of democracy and social justice should contribute to social stability and economic development, as well as the eradication of poverty and the improvement of living standards. Chaos and instability can only aggravate poverty and unemployment.

Second, the struggle for democracy and social justice should find expression in more effective worker participation, for this is an important reflection of democracy and social justice. Worker participation in turn can facilitate the advancement of democracy and social justice.

I sincerely hope that, through deliberations at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, the ILO will make positive contributions to achieving its objectives and purposes, and I quote from the Declaration of Philadelphia: "All human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL SABBAH (representative of Palestine) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is a great pleasure and honour for me to transmit to your distinguished Conference the greetings of the Palestinian people and workers, and the greetings of our leader, brother Yasser Arafat, the President of the State of Palestine. We would also like to offer our warmest congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to preside over this Session of the Conference.

The subject chosen by the Director-General for this Session, democratisation, is very relevant because it responds to the aspirations of all three social partners at a time when the world is undergoing radical transformations which have affected various aspects of political, social and economic life and the world of work. Concepts and regimes which previously held fast have been replaced with new ones. These changes have encouraged the peoples of the world to turn to the United Nations, asking it to assume fully its role, strengthen its credibility and work to ensure that international legitimacy applies throughout the world. In this way, all the peoples of the world will be able to enjoy peace, security and stability.

Within the United Nations system, the ILO has a very specific role to play. It is working towards democratisation in the world of work, through the establishment of democratically-based employers' and workers' organisations, which thus promote a dialogue between the social partners aimed at achieving social progress and world-wide development.

Democracy is the very basis of development and constructive work. Indeed, it ensures first of all respect for fundamental human rights, and especially the rights and freedoms of trade unions. Moreover, it is conducive to a market economy, while strengthening the principle of tripartism, which is based on dialogue, cooperation and collective bargaining.

We would like to pay tribute to the Director-General for the interest he has shown in democracy as it relates to the situation of workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. This situation is cause for concern for the International Labour Organisation. The Director-General has requested that the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) be observed in dealings with Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories.

So far as democracy is concerned, the Palestinian people, renowned for their rich history, for their civilisation and their culture through the centuries, and for Palestine, the birthplace of the monotheistic religions, believe firmly in democracy. The Palestinian people practice democracy in their constitutional institutions, and trade union, social and economic organisations and bodies, as well at the human level in general. Their experience in this area has been exemplary, and can serve as a model for the peoples of the Third World. For instance, we have the Palestine National Council, which is considered a genuine Palestinian parliament, bringing together representatives of various sections of the Palestinian people, as well as their occupational and people's organisation. I may also mention the people's committees at work in occupied Palestine, which form the nucleus of the Palestinian Government. These people's committees conduct humanitarian activities under Israeli occupation and suffer from repression by Israel, which has tried to stifle any and all types of freedoms and rights. I will not now give details ragarding violations of human rights in this field as we will speak on this matter later, at the meeting on this topic scheduled for 16 June.

In practice, democracy must be based on respect for human rights, and that includes the right of people to self-determination. For decades, our people have been fighting to obtain this right of self-determination in order to exercise democracy in the full meaning of the term in their own territory, Palestine.

Progress towards peace was launched at the conference in Madrid, in response to the international desire to establish peace and security on the basis of international law and in accordance with the resolutions of the United Nations. We hope that United Nations organisations and specialised agencies, led by the ILO, will fulfill their dynamic role in strengthening peace based on justice, democracy and the right to self-determination and will also give technical support to the resistance of the Palestinian people.

We also hope that greater interest will be paid to the situation of the workers repatriated after the Gulf crisis, and particularly Palestinian workers, to help safeguard their rights and help them reintegrate themselves into their society. Furthermore, we call upon the international community to raise the economic blockade imposed on Iraqi workers, their families and children. We also call for an end to the air blockade imposed on the people and workers of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya which jeopardises the future of repatriated workers and adds to their suffering and problems.

Everyone is now looking towards the Earth Summit in Brazil and I would like to recall that my people, the Palestinian people, are, every day, exposed to the dangers of environmental pollution: Israel continues to use poison gases and tear gas, and to destroy trees and plants, to establish settlements. Let us not forget the effects of their nuclear power plant in Dimona which has been threatening not only the environment of Palestine, but also the region as a whole.

Finally, whilst we are following with great interest the signs pointing to the victory of the people of South Africa, after many years' suffering under apartheid, we appeal to the international community to maintain its pressure and blockade, to ensure total victory and the establishment of a provisional government and constituent assembly able to guarantee free and democratic elections based on the principle of one person, one vote, guaranteeing that the people of South Africa can, at last, enjoy freedom and independence. I am particularly happy to congratulate the States which have recently become Members of the ILO and I wish this session of the Conference every success.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of New Zealand, may I start by congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to preside over this Conference and offer him our best wishes for the duration of his term of office.

In his report to this Session of the Conference, the Director-General has reminded all of us that the ILO is a unique organisation both in composition and in the values that motivate and guide it. It is not sufficient for delegations to participate in the ritual of International Labour Conferences. They must also reflect its ethics and advocate its mission.

There are three aspects of these values and guiding principles that I would like to comment on today. The first is respect for fundamental human rights. This was enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia through the succinct but inspirational proclamation that labour is not a commodity. The second value is the recognition of the essentially collective nature of work through an obligation on the Organisation and its constituents not just to permit but to promote and encourage collective bargaining. The third is the belief in the added benefits – both social and economic – of tripartism.

There has been a tendency in the past for the practices of member States to be brought to the attention of the ILO if they were overly harsh or oppressive. I would like to suggest that the ILO will need to widen the scope of its concerns if it is to remain loyal to its founding principles. If the New Zealand experience is anything to go by, the new attacks on human rights, collective bargaining and tripartism will not come through the incarceration of worker representatives. They will instead be a result of extreme libertarian legislation that depersonalises labour, removes the instruments of bargaining and tripartism and defies the proud history and record of this Organisation by asserting – by deed if not by word – that labour is no more than a commodity.

A little over a year ago, the New Zealand Government introduced the Employment Contracts Act as omnibus labour relations legislation. This is an unusual Act in international terms because it is massively and devastatingly anti-worker and anti-union, without being overtly repressive. It is largely what could be called permissive legislation. It was promoted as ushering in the ultimate of freedoms in labour relations. The Act was said to be built around two basic freedoms: the freedom to associate and the freedom to contract.

Let me start with freedom of association. The practical application of this principle in New Zealand is aimed at a denial of effective collective recognition. Unions were removed from the statutes. There is no process for registration or recognition, no specification of their rights, their roles or obligations. It is a recipe for both the fragmentation of unions and a massive contraction of their role. It encourages disaffection and breakaways to set up rival organisations, or employers establishing tame staff associations, or multiple representation of workers in any workplace or industry.

It is difficult to claim a place for unions in negotiating key elements of industry policy or of wider social or economic policy if there is no cohesive and authoritative register of who represents who, and no basis for reconciliation of conflicting aims and aspirations. There is no stability in representation because the agency is for the purpose of negotiating a contract and for the workers covered by it. It does not embrace the concept of an area of work, rather than the individuals who are doing it, and the continuity of worker interests.

But just in case this permissive approach might spurn radical unionism, the law comes in with a number of compulsions and prohibitions to make it as difficult and as expensive and as time-consuming as is possible to organise. First, it is illegal to make membership of a union a compulsory element of any industrial agreement. Closed shops, union shops and preference for union members are illegal. Second, each member must individually authorise the union to act, and the authority must specify the scope of representation. The courts are not accepting union assurances of their authority and are requiring written proof of agency at each stage of procedure. Third, before each negotiation, a ratification procedure must be agreed with members. Again, this has an appearance of democracy, but its substance is obstruction of union organisation. Then at any stage of the bargaining process any group of workers can opt out.

Overall, the picture is one of contrived instability, rivalry, fragmentation and bureaucratic obstruction of unions. Freedom of association has been implemented in a form that tries to limit the amount of actual unionisation, and to keep the unit of organisation as small as possible.

But more than this, freedom of association is the freedom of individuals to aggregate their representation. It is not a freedom to associate in order to bargain collectively.

That particular freedom is undermined by the form in which freedom of contract is applied.

There are two themes that were pushed when the legislation was introduced. The first was that new contracts would reflect mutual advantage – that the employers and workers would make arrangements to "suit themselves". The second was the so-called protection of the transitional arrangements.

The Labour Minister put the latter to Parliament in the following way: "It is important to realise that despite the awards being terminated, the individual conditions of employment continue under common law on an individual basis and can be varied only by agreement between the parties".

The assurances were both untrue and meaningless, given the economic environment and its interaction with the pattern of work rights and restrictions that the Act introduced.

There were crucial restrictions on the freedom of the parties to reach agreements to "suit themselves". Strikes to secure an agreement binding more than one employer are illegal. There is thus legal force giving absolute power to employers to unilaterally choose enterprise bargaining or even sectional bargaining within an enterprise, even if the workers individually or collectively choose an industry, a regional, an occupational or a national basis of agreement.

There is no process or structure through which bargaining is directed, and indeed there is no obligation at all on the employer even to negotiate.

The courts have ruled that it is legitimate for employers to unilaterally change the terms – including wage rates and allowances – of contracts once old agreements or contracts expire, provided due notice is given and the employer claims that the change is in fact a lock out.

Further, the courts have ruled that it is legitimate for employers to replace workers who do not accept a new contract with others who will, or with contractors, if the enterprise is under financial stress. The test of what is sufficient financial stress is a very weak one.

It is very easy to lock workers out or to make them redundant.

Thus far, the courts have ruled that it is legal for employers to seek to secure contracts by bargaining directly with individual workers even when they have chosen to be represented by a union. Workers are free to remain silent – to decline offers of individual negotiation – but then the employer can lock them out or replace them.

In uncertain economic times, this has been used to telling effect – workers have essentially been free to contract on the employers' terms or be dismissed or refused work.

The legal leverage that the Act has given employers to set the scope of a contract has been reinforced by changes to the income maintenance regime which have effectively imposed severe financial stress on workers who do not accept the employers' offer of work. This has meant that financial leverage allows the employers to set the content as well as the scope of contract.

The way in which the representation and negotiation aspects of the law interact mean that workers are either on individual contracts, or on collective contracts which are no more than an aggregation of individual contracts. There is no place in the law for collective bargaining in the ILO concept of them.

The debate on the effects of the new law has been conducted in a way that downgrades and marginalises the relevance of basic principles and standards such as those developed and advocated by the ILO.

The New Zealand Government argues that the new law is permissive. It follows that anything that is done under it suits the parties to a contract, and since the aim of the law was to allow the parties to suit themselves, it must consequentially be an outstanding success! The argument is circular, but it is also sinister.

It is sinister because it denies, from its basic premise, that there is anything desirable that labour legislation, institutions and processes should actually try to encourage the parties to achieve.

It denies the human nature of work, and therefore, only judges the results of the law as if labour were a commodity.

It denies equal rights and status of employers and workers, and therefore steers bargaining outcomes down an employer-determined road.

It denies the value of tripartism, and therefore dismantles all tripartite structures.

At base, the New Zealand Government fails to ask the question of what we want to achieve, and therefore, abandons any standards or leadership or management obligations over the employment of labour. It has lifted moral indifference to status of a virtue.

If that cynical abuse of workers' rights starts to infect the labour practices of more countries then the very basis on which the ILO was founded, and which the Director-General attempts to affirm in his Report, will decay. The Organisation will have lost its reason for being, not through a confrontation of its principles and values, but by them being subject to the insult of distain.

These are crucial times for the future of the ILO. If it does not champion the values of its founders and their successors, governments like those in New Zealand will corrupt and destroy it.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DAIBAN (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Yemen) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like first of all to congratulate the President and other Officers of the Conference on their election. We are convinced that under his enlightened leadership, the work of this Conference will be crowned with success.

I should also like to take this opportunity to express our appreciation to Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, as well as to Mr. Shukri Dajani and all the other members of the staff of the Office, for the tireless efforts they continue to make in promoting the goals and objectives of the ILO.

The delegation of my country to the Conference has taken note with interest of the items on the agenda. Democracy, which is a symbol of our age and gives concrete expression to the aspirations of mankind, is in keeping with the approach adopted by Yemen. To us in Yemen, democracy means: security, stability and government by peaceful and lawful means; development, well-being and fulfilment; an economic freedom allied with social justice; cooperation and the establishment of friendly relations with all our brothers and friends; intellectual maturity and the promotion of friendship, taking into account the viewpoints of others – including those of the minority. All these noble concepts are reflected in the Constitution of the Republic of Yemen.

If we accept this notion of democracy, then it has no limits but the responsibility of the public good for the happiness of man and a better future for coming generations.

In order to consolidate economic and social development and fulfil the basic needs of the population in accordance with this democratic concept, the Government of Yemen in unceasingly striving to strengthen development and democracy by promulgating social legislation; the three parties concerned by labour have been involved in the drafting of this legislation.

The Government has introduced a programme of economic and political reforms to cope with economic problems – the most important being unemployment – by innovational and non-traditional means.

At the political level, Yemen is preparing for its first legislative elections in accordance with its new electoral code, which will take place before the end of the year. They will be conducted in accordance with political multipartism and the principle of a peaceful opposition to the party in power.

Democratisation is a very complex process that we are trying to consolidate – although we are well aware that it will entail considerable sacrifice. However, we believe that it is the best means by which we may attain economic and social success, safeguard human rights and attain objectives of social justice.

In this context, we are hoping that we will receive the necessary assistance to consolidate democracy and help it develop in such a way that we may achieve freedom, social justice and human dignity, which are the cornerstones of the ILO.

The agenda of our Conference contains technical items on the prevention of industrial disasters and the adjustment and human resources development; these are in line with the objectives of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (Earth Summit) and further proof that we must try to attain a balance between the environment and development. We therefore support proposals with a view to the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on the prevention of industrial disasters.

Furthermore, we believe that we should, as pointed out in the report on human resources, mobilise international solidarity and economic and technical support with a view to increasing international investment to guarantee primary education in the poorest countries.

We have recently carried out a comprehensive study in Yemen on human resources development with the assistance of the World Bank. We have also conducted a sectoral study, with the help of Germany, to try and improve technical and vocational training. We hope that the international community will help us implement the findings of these studies. We are awaiting with interest the round table which will be organised in Geneva at the end of June – at which brother countries and friends and international organisations and funds will participate – to discuss various areas in which Yemen might receive economic and technical cooperation.

There can be no doubt that we are in favour of: the setting up of democratic societies, human rights, the creation of a much safer environment, the prevention of industrial disasters, programmes to combat unemployment, sickness and poverty and the improvement of working conditions. However, there are disasters directly affecting human rights which are not dealt with the same enthusiasm, proving that there are dual standards in international law. I am referring to the suffering of Arab peoples in Palestine, Lebanon and Iraq and of the great divide existing between words and action. This can only be closed by establishing new relations between countries, based on the principles of justice and equality.

As regards the various activities of the ILO described by the Director-General in the second part of his Report, I should like to make the following comments:

First, it is necessary to set up a regional centre for labour administration in the region of the Arab countries. This centre would be financed in a regular way, particularly by the ILO, in accordance with the contributions paid by the Arab countries to the Organisation.

Second, Arab countries cannot profit fully from the Organisation's publications and instruments on labour – neither from its system of information – because these documents are not published in Arabic.

Third, the share of Arab countries, especially the least developed, continues to be limited in technical cooperation programmes.

Fourth, it is necessary to consolidate or increase cooperation between the ILO and the Arab Labour Organisation, in so far as the latter constitutes a geographical and regional unity.

Yemen supports all efforts undertaken to bring about freedom, social justice and democracy and to put an end to the policy of apartheid in South Africa. We wish to state once again our solidarity with the South African people and our belief in its right to freedom. Finally, we would like to welcome the new members to this Organisation.

In concluding we should like to wish the Conference every success in its work; its results will, I hope, contribute to the well-being of mankind. The delegation of my country will not fail to benefit from the discussions that will take place during this Session of the Conference.

Original – Spanish: Mr. RIOS (Workers' delegate, Venezuela) – It is a pleasure for me, on behalf of the workers of Venezuela, to congratulate the President on his election and we wish him the greatest success in the difficult task of chairing the work of this Conference. We are sure that together with the Vice-Presidents he will lead us to satisfactory results.

There could be no more timely subject for the workers of the world than the subject put forward by the Director-General this year in his Report. The problem of democracy, peace and social justice, the basic principles of the International Labour Organisation, are put forward not just as ideals but also as concrete constitute an appropriate response to the great transformations which are today challenging mankind. It is with great pleasure that we note that the central concern being put to this Conference is so closely in line with the central theme of the ICFTU congress held in Caracas in March of this year.

The Declaration of Philadelphia and tripartism acquire renewed importance in the Report. Democracy and the unwavering commitment of the ILO to the principles which support democracy are masterfully defined and tripartism stands as the concrete contribution of the Organisation to achieving, maintaining and developing true political and social democracy.

The definition of the main players and the necessary mechanisms to put true tripartism into practice are extremely valuable and constitute a plan of action.

The Venezuelan workers would like to publicly thank the Director-General for coming to Caracas for the 15th Congress of the ICFTU. His words, activities and statements, at a time when our country is suffering its worst political crisis of the last 35 years, have been an invaluable contribution to the support of democracy.

For more than 25 years we have attended the meetings of this forum with trust and hope inspired by life in a stable democratic society. Unfortunately this year things have changed. Here and now, in this house of freedom and justice, we have a duty to denounce the existence of a very powerful threat to democracy and its basic institutions.

Certain economic groups are behind these threats. They have accumulated fortunes worth many millions, having looted the national reserves under a docile and paternalistic State. And now today, because that easy complacency of governments based on oil resources has come to an end, and because they are faced with a society which having enjoyed a very long period of democracy is demanding a bigger and better share of everything, they are finding the system less profitable and are attempting to change it to their own advantage in a way that is completely in opposition to the present trend of world history.

As the Director-General said in Caracas, democracy and trade unionism are interdependent concepts, there can be no true democracy without trade unionism and there can be no true trade unionism without democracy. Hundreds of examples throughout the years have shown this to be true.

The Venezuelan trade union movement is facing a ferocious attack. Well thought out and treacherous campaigns seek to annihilate it and are striving to portray the unions as an obstacle to economic development. In a unprecedented attempt to corrupt and distort the administration of justice, the media are being used to condemn and blacken the names of union leaders.

The workers know full well that democracy is the least imperfect form of government. To achieve democracy in Venezuela many of our companions have been to jail, have suffered exile and have given their lives. Mistakes have been made in many areas but we know that the self-regulation of democracy is the only way to make good those mistakes. With all our strength we will confront the messianic tyranny, the voracious neoliberalism and the washed-up leftism which today, in Venezuela, have joined forces in an inexplicable common front.

The internal destabilising factors have found their breeding ground in a dramatic social situation generated by foreign debt, by technocratic structural adjustments imposed by international financial centres and by unfair trade relations between countries.

For those countries which are suffering international injustice and internal destabilisation, it is important to find support in the democratic forces of the world in order to ensure that international organisations of a social order can participate in development programmes under the same conditions as the financial multilateral organisations whose participation is based on the handling of resources and on relations with the private bank.

The present crisis in Venezuela shows that it is imperative to incorporate the human aspect into economic development. This crisis proves that cold, financial calculations, without a counterweight in the social sphere, can cause a polarisation of society and political and social chaos. It shows that whilst technical corrections may be necessary to resolve financial problems, it is imperative not to lose sight of the global aspect of economic development and its ultimate goal: the welfare of human beings. But it also shows, as the Report states, that democracy is a daily task, that the daily actions of political decision-makers and social forces can strengthen it or weaken it, and that institutions, if they do not adapt to change and if they do not offer greater participation, will lose legitimacy and efficiency. It proves that the vote is only the beginning of democracy and it is seeking mechanisms that will allow greater participation of the majority of citizens in the decisions which will decide their destiny that democracy finds its best expression.

The trade union movement in Venezuela is of this opinion and is prepared to make profound changes to its structure in order to expand its participation possibilities and to achieve greater effectiveness in its political and vindicating action. Furthermore, we hope to promote the adoption of the democratic changes which Venezuelan society is demanding.

We hope that our experience, the unity of the workers, the solidarity of international trade union movements, the ILO and the international community as a whole will help us to rid ourselves of the historic anachronism which is threatening us.

This Conference has an enormous responsibility. A new phase has begun. The political changes that have taken place around the world are both challenging and the source of new possibilities. They necessitate the strengthening of the principles of the Organisation, the adaptation of its structure to enable it effectively to contribute to the process of democratisation. We are sure that under the President's leadership this Conference will be able to establish the basis of the ILO of the twenty-first century.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MARIUS (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT) – At this very moment in Latin America the future of our planet is being discussed in a laudable attempt to preserve the environment; and here in Geneva we are discussing the preservation of democracy and seeking new and better ways in which the ILO, consistent with its original principles, can become a fundamental factor in that process.

Both events are inseparable to the extent that the preservation of the environment does not mean only the legitimate protection of the earth that we inhabit, and the nature that surrounds us; it must also generate better conditions for human development. And furthermore, we must be able to capably consolidate, strengthen and guarantee a democratic life and culture for our people.

If we make a serious and responsible analysis, we can conclude that both the deterioration of the ecosystem and the fragility of our democracies have some causes at least in common. Over both events and topics hangs the shadow of one big factor – debt.

There can be no doubt that there will not be an effective solution to the essential preservation of the environment unless the enormous ecological debt of the developed countries, and especially the transnational corporations to the Third World, is paid. The debt for the damage caused to the environment by their indiscriminate and savage exploitation of our raw materials.

And we cannot exempt from this responsibility the complicity of many of our Governments and national political classes.

In the same way, we maintain that it will not be possible to build and consolidate the democracies that we deserve in our countries without an effective rational and human solution to the problem of foreign debt, and to the growing and painful social debt, as has been clearly defined by PREALC.

We regret that the ILO has not backed up the initiative of the WCL to lodge a claim with the International Court of Justice concerning the illegitimacy of the fixing of interest rates for the foreign debt, since this would demonstrate what has been paid and on the other hand the dimension of a problem which was never economic but a continuous and decisive factor of a political kind, despite the cloak of silence which some wish to impose on the matter.

Latin America, with the irresponsible complicity of many of our Governments, is drowning in a spiral of incalculable and very serious consequences, including the export of capital and the payment of interest on the foreign debt; money which is essential to promote effective and consistent programmes of self-sustained development, while new and miraculous investments are sought, more illusion than reality, that undermine even further our independence by binding it to transnational interests which run counter to the needs and aspirations of our workers.

Last year, from this very rostrum, we said that the policies pursued by the majority of Latin American governments and imposed by the IMF were essentially and clearly contradictory and undermined our fragile process of democratisation waged by our people throughout history and the profound involvement and effective commitment to democracy of our workers.

Unfortunately, the institutional collapse of democracy in Peru and the worrying, serious events which continue to afflict Venezuela not only justify our analysis but also increase our legitimate concern when we note the similar regrettable conditions in several of our countries.

Poverty is slavery and is incompatible with freedom for very long, and even less with real democracy, the democracy to which the workers legitimately aspire.

But even more serious are the enormous accumulated frustrations of our peoples which drive them into the mistake of supporting concealed, totalitarian alternatives which will increase in the short term those same frustrations.

The Latin American Presidents at the Guadalajara Summit took an oath to eliminate poverty and injustice before the end of the century.

Unless by means of dictatorial adventures, none of our present Presidents will discharge that responsibility by the end of the century.

Perhaps for that reason, this declaration has not led to any essential revision of current policies. On the contrary, we still see the massive application of dogmatic, authoritarian, neo-liberal policies which multiply expotentially the number of poor and marginalised people, concentrating greater income and wealth in increasingly small minorities, increasing the danger of natural social explosions, generating savage capitalism which scorns the human and the social and jeopardises any form of justice and solidarity.

We are seriously worried about the manipulation of certain economic results in our region with reference to the gross per capita product, when the enormous majority of these "per capita" are daily being further removed from this same "gross product". In many organisations there is talk of growth, but we note that the only thing that is growing tangibly is the foreign debt, even though it continues to be paid; the number of the poor living below the critical poverty line increased from 80 to 240 million in the decade, along with a further 200 million who are far from able to see their basic needs satisfied, while only 7 per cent of the Latin American people live in conditions of abundance and even frenetic consumption and insulting luxury.

To believe that market forces alone can solve these problems is more an ideological illusion than a possible and realistic solution.

To think seriously that the privatisation of vital sectors of our sovereignty (such as telecommunications), while thousands of enterprises abandoned by the speculators remain in State hands, can offer an alternative to development, has nothing to do with rational options of economic policy but much to do with an attemps to privatise profits and nationalise losses.

Even more worrying is the existence of many Governments which state the best intentions here to protect the interests of workers, while at home they try to impose changes on labour legislation by eliminating the fundamental rights of workers and their organisations.

Therefore, from an objective point of view, we feel we must question the sincerity of many of the statements that we hear in this hall, so many commitments and promises. It would seem that we are trying to preserve two worlds which are related to each other by increasingly unrealistic links: the world of international bodies such as the ILO and the world of our daily existence which we find when we return to our homes. In the former we breathe conditioned air, we are in a climate controlled by rules of the game with practices that we can call civilised although not always democratic, a rhythm and a language which seek to inspire certainty, confidence, enthusiasm and self-questioning. The inspiration is lost and the questioning increases when in the real world, which is what we have to deal with, the agreements seen to be very distant, and when they do materialise, they have lost on the way much of their content. Agreements are transformed into lifeless expedients under the rule of bureaucracies which are often not concerned with honesty and justice. Civilised practices are abandoned as inefficient, and certainty and confidence are buried by selfish interests and the abusive exercise of power.

Only this can explain the assassinations and constant threats to trade union leaders in Colombia when they try to defend the aspirations of the workers, the existence of forced labour in Brazil, the arbitrary behaviour of businessmen in Paraguay and Guatemala and the generalised lack of agreement on the promotion of employment in the Latin America region, the constant and growing violation of the rights and freedoms of workers and their organisations.

We share with the Director-General his concern for the strengthening and deepening of our democratic processes. We do this because we share a profound commitment to the democratic vocation and because the majority of workers whose rights we now see undermined continue to believe and hope in the ILO.

Therefore, we believe in the common efforts to make this world of the ILO one closer to and part of the real world.

We think it is essential, firstly, in the interests of basic consistency to promote a profound analysis of the very bodies and mechanisms of the ILO itself and to examine their consistency with the shared principles of an authentic and effective democracy, i.e. a more effective and responsible participation, both as regards membership and representativity as well as efficiency, measured in terms of the actual change in conditions of life and work. It is in this field that we must question how, after so many years of studying the restructuring of the mechanisms for elections in the Governing Body, we still are not in a position to apply such new principles in the coming year.

Secondly, and even though many of the workers' needs are not fully met by such texts, international labour Conventions and Recommendations constitute an essential basis for the rule of law and a guarantee of the essential means of social justice. To promote and guarantee their consistent application, to develop and strengthen the mechanisms and structures of their full application, are major contributions that the ILO can make to the democratisation of our nations.

We hope that these thoughts may promote the common objective of improving living and working conditions by making the human being and human work the fundamental focus of our concerns and comitments.

Mr. KROPIWNICKI (Minister of Labour and Social Policy, Poland) – On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Poland and the tripartite Polish delegation, I wish to express our congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his appointment to the honourable post of President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish him every success in bringing this session to its successful conclusion.

I also wish to extend our warm greetings to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, and to all participants of the present session of the Conference.

But, first of all, as Minister of Labour and Social Policy in the Government of the Republic of Poland, the Government of the country that has just regained its independence and of the nation that, after a very long battle, has regained its rights in its own country – Government of the people, by the people for the people, I wish to express my delight and gratitude to all the people of good will and all the governments and organisations represented here as well as the International Labour Organisation itself, for the solidarity and assistance rendered to us, we who are fighting our way through the darkness of slavery and oppression to freedom and liberties.

At the same time as we have attained our independence, the transformation of all aspects of our life has started. The most important changes are those in the political life of the country, accompanied by changes in the social field and reconstruction of the ecomic system. The simultaneous transformation of these three spheres of life has no historical precedents.

The most important event in the political sphere was the conversion of the system of dictatorship into parliamentary democracy. In the economic sphere we must transform the centrally planned economy into a market one.

With regard to the social aspect, a transformation of society ruled by directives of the Communist Party is underway. A system of individual activity restricted only by legal provisions has been introduced.

Besides the lack of analogy in the world's social history, Poland is a country which decided to carry on all the three transformations in the evolutionary and not the revolutionary way.

The main difficulties in the transformation from a centrally planned to a market economy are: a lack of a detailed vision of such a transformation; a weak legal structure; the lack of an institutional basis; the need for a change in the mentality of individuals, which has been moulded by a different socio-economic and political system. An enormous task, one may say.

Polish society considers the market economy with private ownership as the main objective of privatisation. Through the realisation of this principal objective, we may increase the effective utilisation of existing material resources, which will contribute to the fast and effective development of the private sector, and encourage investment.

The shorter the time needed for privatisation and the more suitable the form chosen for a given sector of economic life, the greater ther chance of success in establishing a social market economy. And there is widespread conviction that the process should be opened also to the employees.

In Poland, in most cases, the legal system inherited from 45 years of Communist regime still exists.

In our attempts at building modern democratic structures in a market economy, we are faced by the need to find a new approach when determining industrial relations. The State has abandoned its role of all-embracing regulator of economic activity and sole guarantor of social safety for workers, and is creating conditions favouring the independent activity of social partners. Poland has made considerable progress in this area. A legal framework has been created to ensure the independent activity of trade unions and employers' organisations, aimed at breaking down barriers restricting the autonomy of social partners in regulating working conditions. However, the State has not given up its role in guaranteeing the necessary social safety of workers. New labour legislation protects workers' basic rights, including the right to safe conditions of work, a minimum wage, and insurance in the event of a loss of employment. It also creates a legal framework for the institutional guarantees of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer. Developments in the last three years, in my opinion, have brought Poland's legislation into conformity with standards set forth in international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

The growing social costs of structural adjustment considerably endanger the continuity and complexity of economic changes. In 1992 the conflict between current consumption and the creation of conditions for socio-economic development will continue to intensify.

In this situation, alleviating the social hardships of the transformation period is the main task of the State's social policy.

The Government has committed itself to protecting the basic living conditions of society. With economic development, social security guarantees will be widened. The scope and the level of these guarantees will be determined through social negotiations.

The State also guarantees fundamental workers' rights. They are based, first of all on: equality of the social partners; freedom to enter into contracts of employment and the freedom of association: Occupational safety and health are also basic rights to be enjoyed by all workers.

The changes that have taken place in Poland since autumn 1989 – that is, in less than three years – cover a small part of human life and a very short period in the life of societies and countries. Nevertheless, in this period, the achievements have been impressive. We may also say that the baggage of painful and misguided experience is considerable.

We believe that with some assistance we may overcome our problems and very soon be not only a partner for well-developed countries but also be in a position to help others.

Planet Earth – in its political, economic and social structures – is no longer an autarchy of different countries and various States. On the contrary, it is a system of developed mutual connections and interrelations. We hope that what was started in Poland in 1989 contributes in a large degree to the dissemination of democracy, the progress of civilisation and the realisation of well-being and social justice. And this is also the objective of the International labour Organisation.

Original – Spanish: Mr. PINZON (Workers' delegate, Panama) – As spokesman for the workers of the Republic of Panama, I am happy to extend greeting to the representatives of the member countries of the ILO gathered here and to express, especially to the workers of the Third World our solidarity and our hope that we shall manage to survive the social tragedy brought about by the neo-liberal economic programmes which are today subjugating the underdeveloped world.

We wish to take advantage of the fact that one of the items on the Conference agenda is precisely adjustment and human resources development to stress the high price that we, the workers of Panama and the Third World in general, are paying as a consequence of the implementation of adjustment programmes which are highly irrational and unfair and which, far from promoting development and democracy in our countries, have worsened the situation and brought about greater economic and social inequalities.

In the case of Panama, the workers and the Panamanian people in general are faced with the well-known neo-liberal recipe embodied in the so-called strategy of economic modernisation, which results not only in the traumatic aftermath of mass dismissals in the public sector, reduction of social expenditure, privatisation and liberalisation of the economy in every sphere, but, in the labour field, is turning back the pages of history to the conditions of semi-slavery of the nineteenth century. This strategy considers cornerstones of social law, such as minimum wages, collective bargaining and freedom of association, as distortions which are obstacles to the free activities of the market and must therefore disappear.

In the past two years retrograde reforms in the labour law have been brought into force which have been denounced by the ILO as violating the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). These also violate the Panamanian Constitution itself and affect directly those working in the private sector. These reforms suspend the right to collective bargaining, restrict the right to strike and make it practically impossible to organise trade unions in the zones where foreign companies are being set up – the maquiladoras. In addition, in the field of human resources, adjustments encourage increasing privatisation of education, especially at university level, calling in question the efficiency and high cost of public education, intent on reducing public expenditure at all cost.

In the state-run sector, the case of unjustified, illegal and immoral mass dismissals of employees and trade union leaders having trade union immunity, which took place as a result of the industrial action of 4 and 5 December 1990, and of which the ILO is also aware, has still not been resolved despite the fact that the Committee on Freedom of Association has urged the Government to settle their claims in conformity with national law and international labour standards. The Government has ignored this request. The workers dismissed continue to be threatened with hunger and despair and, on 29 May 1992, a new appeal was brought before the Supreme Court of Panama in an attempt to seek justice denied under the new "Panamanian democracy".

As authorised spokesman of the workers of my country, I take this opportunity to denounce once again in this tripartite forum the non-compliance by the Government of Panama and the private employers' sector of important instruments and resolutions approved here which we must uphold if we are to respect international law and democratic institutions in our country. As to the private sector, I have to denounce repeated violations of freedom of association by banking institutions in the vanguard of which is the Chase Manhattan Bank whose activities we have already denounced in the past, which recently unjustly dismissed the defence secretary of the banking trade union and the finance secretary of the Confederation of Workers of the Republic of Panama.

Nevertheless, the reactionary reforms called for by international financial bodies do not end there since the so-called "strategy" of official modernisation insists on other adjustments in labour law which also violate ILO Conventions, such as the encouragement of private employment agencies and interference with the trade unions' structure on the basis of the argument that the number of immunities is very high in undertakings. These constitute further motives for conflict which we have already denouced in plenary sittings of this body.

Nevertheless, in view of the difficulties and harassment caused by official economic policy, Panamanian workers have maintained an attitude of common sense and readiness to dialogue with other sectors of the country, including the Government. In particular, in June 1991 we began a process of bipartite consultation (without the Government) with the Chamber of Industrial Employers of our country, which resulted in a concerted proposal for a "Programme for economic development", conceived with the aim of laying a foundation for genuine development and a means of promoting wider dialogue with all national forces.

Thus, in December 1991, the Government, through the Ministry of Labour, launched a "socio-labour consultation" which has in fact not made significant progress owing to official determination to confine dialogue to the labour reforms wanted by the World Bank and not to the real problems of the country: low public and private investment, unemployment, underemployment, low incomes and poverty. Neither has there been any attempt to repair violations of national and international labour standards by repealing controversial laws and reinstating trade union leaders unjustly and unlawfully dismissed. Precisely because of this domineering and anti-trade union attitude on the part of the Government, a claim has been filed with the Department of Trade of the United States which may lead to Panama's being excluded from the benefits of the Caribbean Basin initiative. While this is something the Panamanian workers do not want, it is a legitimate means of pressure to which we have had to have recourse since the Government has left us no alternative.

While the Panamanian workers and Central American workers in general are in favour of dialogue and concertation of effort as a means of paving the way to economic development with genuine social justice, the main obstacle is the attempt of governments to use this consultation with workers and employers to ratify agreements and decisions of economic and social policy already worked out beforehand with international financial bodies behind the backs of the people and their organisations. In these circumstances it is obvious that there cannot be genuine consultation, however much propaganda is used to deceive those who are not in the know.

As principal leaders of Panamanian and Central American organisations, we are not opposed to modernisation of the economy or to the movements for broadening and integration which our part of the world is now experiencing, but we do believe that the rules of the game for developed and Third World countries should be the same. The developed world, through its financial bodies, cannot demand or impose the opening up and liberalisation of our economies while they maintain or raise even higher their protectionist barriers to our products, as is the case with the protective measures the countries of the European Community are taking against Latin American banana exports.

I should like to take this opportunity to state that these measures illustrate the unfair conditions which regulate international trade and are the real causes of debt and underdevelopment in the Third World. We are concerned that these measures will result irremediably in greater unemployment and poverty in our countries, especially in those such as Panama where the banana industry holds an important place in agricultural employment and in the export and foreign currency generating sector. In this respect it is my duty in this forum to call upon governments of the European Community to reconsider these measures and to listen to the protest of thousands of Latin American workers who are today in fear of losing their daily bread.

Finally, I wish to exhort the competent bodies of the ILO to be more vigorous in their efforts to uphold human rights and trade union rights in the world. We cannot allow international labour standards which reflect humanitarian evolution and world civilisation to be a dead letter simply because, paradoxically, another international organisation in the United Nations system, the World Bank, considers them to be distortions of the regime of unbridled capitalism which is becoming ensconced in our countries. This is a challenge that has to be faced by decent and civilised men and organisations in the world and we, the workers of Central America, will meet this challenge with all its implications.

Mr. CALOVSKI (Government delegate, Yugoslavia) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election and wish him every success in discharging his important and demanding functions at this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is a great pleasure to greet the delegations of the member States who are with us for the first time.

I should like to stress that we find the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General to be an objective review of the numerous and significant activities undertaken by the Organisation since the last session of the Conference as well as a good presentation of the basic problems which it faced in this period. If we look at the results achieved in the implementation of the ILO's Programme, we can say that the Organisation's activities, on the whole, have been a success.

The subject which the Director-General chose as the focus of his Report is one which attracts the attention and commitment of all member States, I believe, and especially those among them which have undertaken radical and far-reaching democratic reforms of their political and economic systems.

In Yugoslavia we see in a nutshell many typical difficulties that today's world is facing – the divisions between North and South, East and West, differences in ideological and cultural patterns, national and ethnic specificities, etc. The processes which are under way in Yugoslavia are part of broader transformations in the world and, in particular, of the deep changes in Eastern Europe which occurred against the background of the total collapse of the past socio-political system and the emergence of a new one, based on parliamentary democracy and market economy. Yugoslavia had to accept the inevitability of such transformations, but under far more difficult circumstances because, as you know, it is a complex mosaic of multinational and multiconfessional communities.

The force with which such differences are now clashing in Yugoslav lands is a consequence not only of internal contradictions, but also of very blunt external interference and pressures.

The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia does not dispute any nation's legitimate right to self-determination; it respects the decisions of former member-republics which have declared their independence and autonomy, but it cannot accept that the same right be denied to those of its nations which wish to continue living in Yugoslavia. One-sided accusations blur the causes of conflict and, consequently, the road towards solutions.

In the belief that it is possible to find a political solution acceptable to all, we are making efforts to regulate mutual relations and clarify financial, legal and all other issues within the framework of the Conference on Yugoslavia under Lord Carrington's chairmanship.

In addition to the tragic and massive loss of human life and huge devastation of property, we are facing the problem of providing the barest necessities to hundreds of thousands of refugees and addressing the problem of their return to their homes, which in all likehood cannot be resolved soon. A series of problems in the field of legal status and employment have yet to be put on the negotiating table in order to be resolved through agreements between the republics whose citizens are involved. Because of expulsion from work (because they belong to certain ethnic communities or because of lay-offs of Serbian people who were unable to report to work due to war operations and severed transport and communication links) many workers are currently deprived of many employment-related rights. They cannot receive their salaries, benefit from social security, collect their pensions, etc. In addition to many outstanding legal issues regarding property, we have to deal with problems related to the recognition of years of service, contributory periods, years of pensionable service, and to exercise the already acquired rights of that type. We feel that the expertise in this regard of the International Labour Organisation could be of vital importance in our efforts to resolve these difficult problems.

This Conference, with its firm commitment to fight all types of discrimination in employment and at work, is precisely the right forum for expressing our dissatisfaction with the fact that Yugoslavs employed abroad are required in some countries to state which ethnic community they belong to, so that the employer can make his selection on that basis. We have evidence of numerous cases of Serbian workers being humiliated and laid off in large numbers. We wish to believe that those are just individual cases, rather than the policy of such countries, and we hope that such practices will not continue.

Despite these difficulties, the earlier processes of ownership transformation, consolidation of market institutions and the emergence of a multitude of new trade unions, continue on a parallel track although with certain lags. Collective bargaining is still hindered by lack of experience, and economic troubles narrow the scope for negotiation. We have yet to develop strong, representative, well-prepared and independent organisations of employers and workers.

In the sincere belief that the establishment of tripartite structures and tripartite exchange and decision-making can promote a speedier and more successful economic recovery and development acceptable to all social partners, we support the commitment of the International Labour Organisation to extend all the necessary assistance to its Members. We expect that, in the best traditions of its relations with my country, the ILO will keep up the activities we have been carrying out ourselves to this end.

With regard to the issue of social security, to which the Director-General referred in his Report, I should like to state briefly our views on the subject. Although we are now concentrating all available resources to provide elementary aid to persons affected by the war, we are aware of the need to formulate a new concept of social policy which will complement the market and ownership transformation of the Yugoslav economy. The number of beneficiaries of social facilities and the forms of social security in our country have been increasing; at the same time, the financial base of these allocations is narrowing, so that our society today is no longer capable of supporting all the forms of social spending. It is our commitment that the integration of social and economic policies must be developed on the principle of spending within the limits of earning, with appropriate social justice in the use of such funds, all with a view to stimulating economic growth and positive effects on the labour market.

In our opinion the past period has, for many countries, been a difficult one. For Yugoslavia, exceptionally so. We have not yet succeeded in overcoming our serious and tragic crisis, but we are not losing hope. At this moment our greatest ally is truth – which is finding it difficult to come into the open – and not pressure and punitive measures. A number of delegations have communicated their reservations on the participation of our delegation. Rest assured that, in accordance with the decision of the Federal Assembly of Yugoslavia of 27 April 1992, we shall do our best, as we have been doing so far, to give our positive and constructive contribution to the ILO.

Lastly, allow me to express my conviction that this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will have a positive impact, especially if, in addressing some key problems, the entire structure of our Organisation displays and appropriate degree of political readiness to do so.

Original – French: Mr. STANKEVICIUS (Government delegate, Lithuania) – Having lived for 50 years outside the community of free countries, Lithuania is honoured to declare its attachment to the objectives of the International Labour Organisation.

In the name of the freedom of mankind and of social justice, Lithuania will strive, within the framework of the Organisation, to reach individual agreements with each Member of the ILO.

The political and economic situation in my country is not easy. Before the war we were on an equal footing with other European countries; today, however, Lithuania lags behind in the area of economic development and as regards living standards. As an occupied country, we were faced to accept the inefficiency of the socialist economic system. Most of the Europeans States have a far higher per capita GNP.

In these conditions the objective of the Government is to re-establish the State and create normal living conditions. We can bring this about solely by continuing along the chosen path. By rebuilding social structures we wish to liberate initiative and encourage activities that were disrupted during many years. We will have to create good working conditions, and make it possible for workers to earn a decent wage. Lithuania will be free when its inhabitants are free and wealthy.

Our objectives are to restore order and liberalise the economy; to raise living standards; and to ensure social justice. One can change the economy by implementing legislation in the economic and social field. We understand that the success of reforms will depend on the introduction of efficient structures for social protection. As we move towards a free market, the Government will respect human rights.

The Government is doing everything it can to bring about conditions that favour the free development of the individual, and to develop each citizen's sense of duty and responsibility for the well-being of his family and of the State.

The Government will also defend the dignity of the individual by creating acceptable conditions of work, life and social security. It is doing its best to ensure that every individual is free to choose his education, occupation and place of work, irrespective of sex, age, race and religious or political conviction.

The Government guarantees the right of individuals to organise in defence of their occupational, economic or social interests.

We are already well along the way to achieving these objectives through various Bills and Acts. This legislation concerns employment, collective agreements, employment contracts, wages, guaranteed income, social security, etc.

In formulating this legislation, we take into consideration ILO Conventions and Recommendations which ban forced labour, recognise the social partners, advocate consultation in decision-making and condemn discrimination.

We try to avoid the State's direct intervention in legislation concerning social questions and the labour market. The State seeks to limit its role to the provision of minimum guarantees for the workers, and to develop these guarantees by defining the competence of employers, and leaving the solution of most issues to negotiated agreements.

This is no easy task. The situation in my country is complicated by the fact that employers' and workers' organisations are divided and are often unable to find common ground. The reason is that we do not have vast experience with state institutions.

This is the legacy of a totalitarian State. In the past trade unions were state-run and permeated by politics. The State was the sole employer and controlled everything. We need stronger workers' and employers' organisations, which we hope to achieve by allowing for more private property.

One of our major worries is the threat of increasing unemployment. To counter this we have set up employment services. We created an employment fund based on social insurance. This year we hope to complete the reform of employment regulations pertaining to occupational consultation and vocational training, particularly for adults. We hope to prepare special programmes for those who are unable to compete on the labour market.

I would like to emphasise adult education and vocational retraining as one of the principal instruments to regulate the labour market.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank governments who are helping us to stabilise the labour market, to upgrade vocational training and to improve occupational safety.

We hope to work very closely with the International Labour Organisation and to benefit from its vast experience. Of course we regret that we cannot transplant all solutions to Lithuania. We have to look ourselves for a way out of this rather serious situation. But we are convinced that the experience and the assistance of ILO member States will help us to overcome our difficulties.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ARZENO (Employers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – I would like, on behalf of the employers of the Dominican Republic, whom we represent at this session of the Conference, to extend our sincere congratulations to the President on his election to the Chair of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and we are convinced that, under his guidance, we will successfully compete the work that we have on our agenda.

In the same way, we would also like to state our satisfaction with the excellent Report put forward by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to thank him for the important subject which is dealt with in this Report, Democratisation and the ILO.

We have always felt that democracy, as the Director-General points out in his Report, is a universal value in which each human being can aspire to freedom and justice and we feel that these values can be achieved only within a system which is governed by democratic principles. In the same way it has been the concept of democracy which has inspired the ILO in its work, because only with full enjoyment of democracy can the values which are promoted by tripartism be truly achieved, tripartism is the essence of our Organisation and which has flourished in those countries where democratic ideals are put into practice.

We agree that the ILO should offer its constant support to those countries in the process of transition and in those that have quite recently started the path of democratisation, so that they can make the necessary adjustments without adversely affecting their democratic life.

The employers in our country have played a very important role in the initiation and strengthening of our young democracy and in recent years we have contributed, together with our authorities, towards ensuring that the structural adjustments required by the society of the Dominican Republic can be carried out in the economic, legal, fiscal, financial and political spheres and, particularly, in the field of labour relations.

The new Labour Code, which has just been promulgated by the President of the Republic, is the result of consensus. It is the result of the will of the social partners, together with the very valuable participation of the Catholic Church in the Dominican Republic.

The employers of the Dominican Republic have found great satisfaction in having participated in drawing up this new Labour Code which is the result of a social pact within a tripartite structure between Government, employers and workers.

I would like to point out that the 740 sections which make up the new Labour Code were achieved in this way. The new Code brings together the comments made by this Organisation with regard to previous legislation in the field of labour law in our country and introduces innovations such as standards which protect the workers' claims in the event of insolvences by the employer; there is a notable strengthening of trade union freedom and there is a broader framework for collective bargaining, as well as other measures which update and modernise our legal framework in the field of labour relations.

We would like to point out that our new legal statute which covers labour relations is an example of the way in which social concertation can become a valuable instrument in achieving consensus and thus adequately meeting the challenges posed in solving labour problems in a world which is constantly undergoing technological, economic, social and political change.

The employers of the Dominican Republic would like to stress, at this Conference, the need that exists for the ILO to lay down international standards governing the working conditions in special economic zones, which in some countries are called export-processing areas and industrial free export zones in others, because of the very broad economic impact which these areas have on our countries and, most specifically, on the creation of permanent jobs. We feel that the situation in these areas is something which would merit an in-depth study on the part of the ILO.

The International Labour Organisation will shortly be holding a Regional Conference in the city of Caracas and the Employers of the Dominican Republic are extremely interested in this most important meeting which will be dealing with issues which are vital to our continent, such as economic adjustment and social security.

The social dialogue which we have mentioned, which was started in our country some years ago, and the main result has been the agreement on a new Labour Code, has also on many occasions touched on the issues of economic adjustment and social security.

We feel it is timely that a meeting of this kind should become a summit at which the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean can adopt new structures and legislation to incorporate the forthcoming changes that our continent requires.

We thus hope that, as in the past, we can play an important role, having as our main objective the protection and promotion of stable employment for our region, which will be compatible with technological change, the flexibility required by the various markets for goods and services and in line with democratisation, which is the sign of our times.

Original – Arabic: Mr. OULD HAYE (Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Youth and Sports, Mauritania) – In the name of God, the Almighty, the Compassionate!

Allow me, on behalf of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, a country which is a friend of Portugal, to offer my warmest congratulations to the President and the officers of the Conference on their election to preside over the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am absolutely certain that, thanks to their knowledge and skills, our work will be crowned with success and I am sure that we will produce satisfactory results. In this connection, you can count on the total cooperation and support of my country's delegation. Congratulations also go to the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO. I would like to thank them for the very comprehensive reports that have been made available to all delegations and for the excellent way in which they have prepared our work.

Please also allow me to welcome the countries which have joined our Organisation this year and which will no doubt help to strengthen the positive role of this Organisation.

The Director-General's choice of the theme of democracy for this session is a very relevant, and one which is a matter of concern to most member States. Our session this year is taking place at a time when, on the international scene, radical transformations have prompted peoples all around the world to establish political regimes based on their own will and reflecting their own legitimate aspirations to enjoy freedom and to be the masters of their own destinies. This growing trend resulted from an increasing awareness of the close link between democratic practices and economic and social growth. It is quite clear today that peoples cannot achieve lasting growth in a context of equality, justice and respect for human rights unless they can manage their own affairs and decide their future options for themselves.

Faith in these principles has led us in my country, under the distinguished leadership of President Maaouya Ould Sid' Ahmed el Taya, to begin a global democratisation process that will result in the legislation and organisations that establish a State governed by the rule of law.

Thus on 20 July 1991 a new Constitution for our country was ratified by means of a general referendum. This Constitution guarantees all citizens their individual and collective rights and, in particular: freedom of opinion and freedom of speech; the right of assembly; freedom of association, and the right to belong to any political or trade union organisation of one's choice; the right of trade, industry, and of intellectual, artistic and scientific property, and other forms of fundamental freedoms. The Constitution also guarantees the independence and impartiality of justice.

In accordance with the Constitution, we elected a President of the Republic on 24 January 1992 following presidential elections in which there were several candidates. In April 1992 we established a Parliament composed of two Houses: the Senate and the National Assembly, following legislative elections in which there was a great deal of democratic competition. International observers noted that these elections took place in an atmosphere of freedom and transparency.

Today in Mauritania there are no fewer than 15 political parties carrying out their activities in all freedom. There are also a number of independent newspapers – more than 30 in fact.

The establishment of these democratic institutions, which are considered to be the expression of the will of our people, is a great achievement of us. We are determined to preserve and strengthen these institutions by means of economic and social development programmes such as the global national programme that will soon go before Parliament.

One of the pillars of these programmes in the field of labour and social affairs is on-going dialogue among the various social partners, for dialogue is the only means of solving problems in an atmosphere of understanding and stability. This was in fact confirmed by means of collective bargaining on 2 September 1991 which resulted in a general increase in wages and an increase in family allowances, both of which came into force in January 1992.

The Director-General of the ILO has drawn attention to the fact that while democracy is the road which we are now on, this does not mean that we should forget the difficulties being experienced by many member States, particularly the developing countries whose peoples still need to become aware of the principles of democracy. We quite agree with the Director-General's view in this connection. He considers that we should define how to help the countries concerned so that economic crises will not stifle their hopes born out of democracy and political freedom.

On this point, we pay a tribute to the role played by the ILO in the planning and implementation, with member States, of a number of technical cooperation projects designed to provide exemplary use of human resources, in favour of training programmes, programmes to increase skills and management programmes. I would like to thank the Organisation for the assistance that it has given our country in these areas. An example I would like to mention is a colloquium in April last year at Nouakchott for labour inspectors and supervisors and the direct contacts mission, that took place at the same time, to advise us in the field of labour legislation.

Before ending this brief speech, I must emphasise that the hope of seeing a new world of democracy, peace and stability will remain dim whilst there are still people who suffer under the yoke of occupation and racial discrimination, as is the case in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, and in southern Africa.

The fact that special sittings have been devoted to these two subjects during the coming days shows that this honourable assembly is aware of the seriousness of the situation in these areas and of the need to take more effective and rigorous action to improve this situation.

Original – French: Mr. KALANTZAKOS (Minister of Labour, Greece) – First of all, I should like to express my sincere congratulations to the President, on his election. I hope that under his wise leadership the Conference will reach fruitful conclusions.

I should also like to stress the importance of the choice made by the Director-General when he opted for democratisation as a theme for reflection by the Conference in his annual Report. As Minister of Labour, I associate myself entirely with the major outlines set out in this Report and I welcome the opportunity to make my own contribution here.

The spectacular changes that have taken place in the past few years on the international scene have resulted in the triumph of democracy.

What is of fundamental importance nowadays is the universal recognition that economic freedom goes hand in hand with political freedom. Individuals must feel free if we want them to become entrepreneurs and to produce goods and services, if we want them to feel that they live within what I would describe as an optimum society which, in addition to the material wealth it produces, should have mankind as its focal point.

My thoughts go out to the countries of the East which are now going through an extremely difficult period.

The switch to a market economy is a long-term process which must come about in conditions of maximum social equity.

To enable societies to cope with the process of transition, it is necessary to liberate industrial relations from the interventionist habits of the past and replace them with tripartite structures.

The International Labour Organisation, by virtue of its reputation, may serve as a beacon for countries which have just begun to learn about democracy.

In addition, the most advanced member States in the field of labour law and industrial relations must establish direct links with a view to passing on their wealth of experience. A series of multilateral or bilateral cooperation programmes will consolidate the democracy to which all these countries aspire.

Greece, surrounded by Balkan States, has already set out along this path by establishing genuine relations which will help these countries to set up a market economy and consolidate democracy.

At this point in my speech, I would like to emphasise the predominant role of private enterprise as the cornerstone of our bilateral economic system. I should like to stress that the vitality of enterprises and the contribution of every member of their staff in working towards innovation, productivity and the conquest of markets must always be uppermost in the minds of social actors. This must be time, primarily, with regard to economic matters. There is no way of meeting workers' aspirations in an enterprise if that enterprise is not innovative, competitive and profitable. However, I believe that this concern goes beyond just the economic aspect. Nothing lasting can be achieved without the establishment within enterprises of good social and industrial relations.

Social and economic dynamism always fuel each other. The main problem with social relations in an enterprise is to encourage behaviour and create legal instruments that will be adequate for the purpose and take maximum account of both the aspirations of the employees and inexorable economic constraints.

For this purpose, the conditions for equitable participation by the social partners must be allied to the furtherance of the common goal. In addition, a code of conduct must be established which without doing away with confrontation, will nevertheless help to avoid conflict.

The employers must realise that the enrichment of forms of expression and involvement of the workers in the life of the enterprise, far from being a threat to them, can on the contrary prove to be a powerful factor in improving labour organisation and efficiency. Furthermore, the existence of independent and representative trade unions is a prerequisite for a modern country because they make it possible to foresee and deal with dispute and promote social dialogue.

In the present context of accelerated change, trade unions must abandon attitudes of rejection and resignation and adopt a more constructive approach, taking account of all the macro- and micro-economic constraints and coming to terms with them in order to be able subsequently to formulate original counter proposals.

Thus the aim of trade unionism cannot only be to obtain in what way more for employees but also to examine organisation changes may constitute social progress in terms of skills and wages.

The public authorities for their part must also play a promotional role in social matters, possibly abandoning their active involvement through the imposition of rigid all-embracing views. What the State should be seeking to do is to extend social practices involving information between social actors, flexible co-operation between them and collective bargaining.

Social innovations should be encouraged by the social partners themselves and no longer imposed by the State. The appropriate level of local co-operation is that of the enterprise, as the nucleus and basis of the economic fabric of each country. It is at this level that the balance can best be struck between progress, between rises in wages and the volume of employment.

I should like to continue my remarks by taking my own country as a point of reference.

Greece, anxious to modernise the world of labour in enterprises has laid great emphasis on the democratisation of industrial relations. As a result, the furthering of free collective agreements has recently been resumed.

Today, industrial relations in Greece are governed by very progressive laws as compared with those which existed before. The centre of gravity is being moved towards the social partners who are becoming entirely responsible for their decisions. Accordingly the parties to a dispute may have recourse to an arbitration body independent of State tutelage.

Above all, the new legislative framework enhances the role of the trade unions in the enterprise. This will make them more aware of the results achieved by their enterprise. Furthermore, the law has specially provided for a new form of collective agreement concluded between the trade union and the manager of an enterprise.

I would like to close my speech with the following remark: Freedom cannot last unless there is social justice – the necessary prerequisite to consolidate and assimilate democracy.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ZAMORA MEDINACELLI (Minister of Labour and Social Development, Bolivia) – We find it most appropriate that the Director-General of the ILO should have chosen, as the main topic for this session of the Conference, Democratisation and the ILO. This subject is particularly important at a time of irreversible changes on the world stage when peoples unite to seek world peace, democracy, economic development and social justice. This has led to putting an end to the past and the beginning of a search for a new international era without hegemony and with greater justice and freedom.

Many countries have undergone changes and, as a result, arbitrary regimes and military dictatorships have been replaced by governments that are opening the way to democratisation, allowing individual freedom to their citizens. The peoples of these countries also feel the need for an inseparatable relation between the democratisation which has been achieved and the social justice which is still hoped for. For this reason democracy and social justice are the twin banners of a struggle on the part of millions of men and women as the best and only way to achieve political, economic and social coexistence nationally and internationally.

In spite of these desires to live in democracy and achieve social justice, most of these countries face enormous difficulties which jeopardise not only the democracy that they have achieved but the very life of the nation. The lack of any effective response to social problems, due to the separation between economic and social solutions, has led to situations of deepening social anguish and greater poverty and unemployment.

This situation of social frustration, which is a source of concern in the Director-General's Report, is due to the application of policies for stabilisation and economic development, within a new economic model where the market rules supreme and where often there is a lack of attention to or underestimation of the social problems which have been inherited from the past or generated by the new economic adjustment measures.

Another negative and worrying aspect of the application of economic adjustment measures is the fact that to a large extent they benefit unilaterally and openly privileged sectors which gradually assume control of the economy. These sectors, bolstered by their economic power, try to impose the rules of the game, not only in political matters but also in the social spere. As is normal, this attitude runs counter to sectors which have lagged behind and in some cases is even contrary to the State, when it tries to limit or incorporate the action of such sectors within the frame of the law. That is, instead of sharing the difficulties and helping the State to ease the social burden they direct their action towards the search for greater advantages without heeding the fate of the impoverished sectors or of democracy.

These realities become even worse when we see that many international organisations, which are directly involved in the economic adjustment measures, make recommendations which do not take into account the peculiarities of each country nor the difficulties which their recommendations might provoke. These cold reserved policies nearly always are imposed and therefore they are measures which are dangerous to social stability and to the political and internal stability in these countries.

To this situation we must add another, which is very detrimental to the workers' sectors and which results in the unbridled desire for the application of measures of structural adjustment to destroy or at least to weaken the trade union organisations in order to prevent any type of organised action on behalf of the workers in defence of their legitimate social interests. In other words, there are sectors of society which are economically strong and which attempt to hegemonise everything without recognising the rights of the other sectors of society. This weakening of trade union organisations directly affects the real possibility of applying and respecting a policy of dialogue which is the only way to reach social peace. We cannot close our eyes to the reality which exists at the national and international levels as regards the weakening of the trade unions.

We can see this even in the assembly of the ILO, where the role of workers' organisations has been weakened. It is therefore imperative to defend the rights of workers to organise as one of the universal principles that was at the very origin of the ILO. Therefore there is a need for the ILO, more than ever today, to take measures to defend the rights of workers to organise and to participate in the social, economic and political life of their countries.

We would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report in which he has pointed to many of these concerns with wisdom and objectivity. But we feel that these principles must be followed up with concrete measures such as initiatives which would urge the international bodies which direct and support the economic adjustment measures, and specifically the IMF and the World Bank, to abstain from proposing to member States policies that will directly affect social policy programmes and the organisation of workers. As the Director-General himself has said, these policies should envisage or at least take into account the criteria of the ILO and those of governments on social policy. These are some aspects of the reality experienced in countries that have recovered democracy and where ajustment measures are being applied. Thus our peoples, and in particular the labour sector and the poor, are discouraged and do not have the slightest hope in these structural changes and even less in the international organisation which recommend them. It is indeed very difficult to have faith in a better future in the midst of poverty and marginalisation.

A year has passed since the last session of this Conference, and this year has been an important one for the Bolivian people. In the face of many difficulties, particularly as regards internal and external resources, our Government, led by Dr. Jaime Paz Zamora, has launched a national mobilisation campaign at considerable human and financial expense, to wage war on poverty, concentrating on the depressed rural areas and the marginal districts of our cities, where even minimum human conditions are non-existent. We are attempting to solve the basic problems of education, health and sanitation and our success will to a large extend depend on the degree of mobilisation and support by the different social sectors of the country, as well as the understanding of international organisations which control our fiscal resources.

In the socio-labour sphere, this year was the third consecutive one in which we managed to negotiate a wage policy with employees in the public sector, through the trade union organisation headed by the Single Bolivian Workers' Trade Union. Although the level of incomes of workers and employees is low, the increases accepted did at least reflect the minimum aspirations.

Another aspect concerns the trade union freedoms and rights of workers, a matter of great interest to the ILO. We are please to reaffirm emphatically that all these rights are fully respected in Bolivia, that every single right proclaimed by the Constitution is strictly applied and enjoyed by all workers. This means, essentially, the respect for the independence and unity of workers and the strict application of the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of trade unions. This is the reason why Bolivia continues to have a single central union of all workers, the Single Bolivian Workers' Trade Union, which is democratically elected, we are glad to say, and independent of any political or ideological tendency. In the trade union sphere, the Government confines its action to guaranteeing the rights of workers, providing for the strict observance of trade union protection as regards the activities of trade union officials and allocating the necessary resources for the maintenance of trade union premises.

Our relations with employers' organisations are perfectly normal and based on mutual respect and the constitutional principle which guarantees and promotes free organisation.

Original – French: Mrs. NGIRIYE (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Burundi) – On behalf of the Republic of Burundi and of the delegation which I have the honour to lead, and also on my own behalf, I should like to associate myself with the preceding speakers to express my sincerest congratulations to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and the other officers on their election to the high posts and functions of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. Their experience, skills and outstanding personal qualities will permit us, I am quite sure, to conclude successfully the work of this session. I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express my gratitude to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, and his collaborators, for their important work in the course of past year, and also for the high quality of the Report before the Conference.

The Report of the Director-General gives us a clear overview and an insightful analysis of questions that merit this Conference's full attention: Democratisation and the ILO deals with a subject that merits careful consideration, given its timeliness and importance. The contribution of my delegation to the discussion of the Report of the Director-Général will be based mainly on Part I of his Report, with reference to the situation prevailing in my country, Burundi. My delegation approves fully the principles, objectives and strategies that are contained in the Report. The 79th Session of the International Labour Conference takes place at a very important and critical time of structural adjustment and the introduction of political dialogue in a context of the democratisation of institutions in many developing countries, including Burundi. About three months ago the Republic of Burundi adopted by popular referendum, on 9 March 1992, a pluralist Constitution which conforms with the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 10 December 1948, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 16 December 1966, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 18 June 1981, and the Burundi Charter of National Unity of 5 February 1991.

Thus the Constitution of my country explicitly guarantees the unconditional respect of the individual, equality of opportunity, freedom of thought, opinion, press assembly and association, and participation in the management of the State, and others.

If the Industrial Revolution showed that although freedom belongs to all, not all could use it, our Constitution clearly states that freedom is not the privilege of the few, but that, according to article 14, "All men are equal in dignity, rights and obligations, without distinction based on sex, origin, ethnic group and religious conviction or opinion."

The process of democratisation, which is only in its early stages in Burundi, already shows that the path which leads to a free society must also aim at social justice.

In the light of the high principles of the ILO, the Director-General's Report spells out that democracy must logically aim at ameliorating the daily well-being of the people who have courageously fought for it.

However, we note that in our country, as in other developing countries, improvements in the well-being of the population depend on a shift of economic models, in particular by means of structural adjustment programmes to correct existing financial imbalances. This transition is undoubtedly very difficult.

In this context, Burundi, my country, has already undertaken concrete measure to bring about a series of reforms regarding the restructuring and privatisation of public enterprises; the liberalisation of trade, industry and employment; the simplication and clarification of administrative procedures, etc.

These reforms are not without somewhat negative secondary effects, such as the loss of jobs in the formal sector and unemployment among young job-seekers; the risk is that the population will lapse into permanent pessimism and frustration.

In this decisive period for many countries round the world, the International Labour Organisation, always faithful to its objectives and principles, which we respect, will often be called upon to help its Members to bring about conditions of democratic development which minimise constraints to the extent possible.

The task is not an easy one; it requires great courage. But I do not doubt for a moment that the ILO will do everything it can, within its means and mandate, to help its member States to achieve the best results.

As for Burundi, we look for the ILO to support our efforts in the field of political and economic democratisation, especially in the fields mentioned in the Director-General's Report: the respect of fundamental human rights, especially in the field of work, and the strengthening of activities aimed at promoting the ratification and application of standards. Secondly, the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining within the framework of labour legislation and industrial relations. Thirdly, assistance in the creation of an efficient and rational labour administration, with an emphasis on the promotion of employment. Fourthly, the establishment of a programme for vocational retraining with a view to facilitating occupational mobility and the adaptation of social security systems to new circumstances.

As regards Part II of the Report of the Director-General, "Activities of the ILO", I rejoice in the achievements and results of the past year. Cooperation between the ILO and Burundi plays a very important role in such areas as labour standards, employment, training, labour administration and social security.

In the field of international labour standards the ILO continued its training seminars; the most recent was held in April 1992 in Tunis. Likewise it continued promoting the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

As regards the application of Conventions, in particular of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (no. 29) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), my Government, as indicated in our replies addressed to the Director-General of the ILO, has just adopted, in addition to the Constitution, two very important Acts: one pertaining to the political parties and the other to the press. These Acts repeal certain legal texts which were incompatible with ILO Conventions, in what is an ongoing process.

In the fields of employment and training, plans for training and skill improvements, the consolidation of human resource planning and special labour-intensive public works programmes continue on course.

As regards labour administration and social security, the training of labour inspectors and the realisation of actuary studies were carried out to the satisfaction of the Government of Burundi.

As Minister of Labour and Social Security of Burundi, I would like to point out, none the less, that this cooperation should be strengthened and further developed.

I could not finish my statement without saying a word on the policy of apartheid in South Africa which violates international standards on human rights. My Government completely endorses the passage of the Report of the Director-General which suggests that our Organisation has good reasons to hope that some aspects of apartheid which this Conference has repeatedly criticised, will soon disappear.

I trust that the wave of democratisation felt around the world will extend to South Africa, and that its people, deprived of justice and peace for so long, will be able to recover their fundamental rights.

Finally, I would like to express the hope that our Organisation will take up the problems which the various countries are facing, showing a sense of international and solidary responsibility, undertake an objective analysis and find appropriate solutions.

I wish the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference every success in its noble mission.

Original – French: Mr. DENIS (representative of the World Confederation of Teachers) – May I first of all congratulate the President on his election. I wish the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference every success.

The Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO deals with a major problem at the heart of all the upheavals which today affect all countries of the world without exception.

However, there are omissions in the Report which prevent consideration of the conditions which are indispensable today to the development of democracy. The Director-General emphasises that he is aware of this. "I have dealt with what I consider to be the essential", he says on page 63 of the English version of his Report.

As spokesman for teachers who are grouped together in the World Confederation of Teachers, I wish to lay stress on certain important features. We must insist upon the need for the genuine and concrete exercise of political, economic and social democracy in developing countries as well as in industrialised countries.

Privatisation, a market economy with a human face, the gearing of education and training to employment, a policy of structural adjustment and subsidiarity, are, it seems, the keynotes of the Report, as well as of the document on adjustment and human resources development. But do they really cater for the needs of the most deprived? Do they express what cannot be said by those who do not live under democracy?

Democracy is a long apprenticeship. It is not something acquired once and for all. It is acquired within the family unit through the settlement of conflicts inherent in living in a community. It is also learned at school, thanks to the actions of professionals in the educational field, namely teachers. In the document I have mentioned no reference is made to their role, while stress is laid in the case of Africa and Latin America, among other countries, on reductions in social expenditure which limit access to education and training. More serious still is the decline in the number of children attending school as well as in the demand for elementary schooling.

It is indispensable to develop basic skills. It is proclaimed on all sides, but, at the same time, the inadequacy and uneven spread of the resources allocated to educational systems of severe budgetary cuts make these systems inoperative. Primary and secondary schooling and technical and vocational training are the most severely affected.

Our societies in full transformation require from teachers an ever-changing task full of increased and diversified responsibilities.

Despite the existence of international instruments of general scope and despite an instrument specifically dealing with teachers, the situation of teachers all over the world instead of improving, as it should in view of their essential role in the development of democracy, is constantly deteriorating.

This is true of working conditions, remuneration, training, respect for freedom, and, in particular, freedom of association. Despite the political declarations of many governments recognising the predominant role of teachers, the decisions which should stem from these declarations are still being waited or are either minimal of totally non-existent.

It is not a question of corporatism or elitism. Teachers know that they are and want to be in the service of the most underprivileged. In many countries they have been the initiators and defenders of democracy. Many of them have paid a heavy price. They have been murdered, imprisoned, tortured and had administrative penalties imposed on them.

The World Confederation of Teachers pleads in favour of a political, social and economic solution to the debt crisis which will spread out the responsibility for this crisis. The WCT rejects any solution to the debt crisis which undermines the political and social cohesion of the States' concerns by placing the burden on the shoulders of those who are not responsible and which acts to the detriment of sectors such as teachers who depend on the budget of the public authorities.

The WCT stresses the importance of education in general and the role of teachers in particular in every plan designed to overcome the economic crisis and any analysis of costs and advantages of solutions and remedies proposed.

It is indispensable to redefine the responsibility of the public authorities in the organisation and financing of teaching, with account being taken of the specific responsibility of non-governmental bodies and financial restrictions imposed by the need for budgetary equilibrium; this redefinition must be based on the unique role of the public authorities in the sphere of education and the priority of education in the state budget as a whole, and the importance of the public authorities and that of society as a whole for ensuring the existence of a competent, motivated and respected teaching profession.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Since we have no more speakers on our list this morning, I now declare this morning's session closed.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Eighth sitting

Monday, 8 June 1992, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Solorzano Martinez

Original – Spanish: The President (Mr. Solorzano Martinez) – We will now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Afghan: Mr. AABED (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Afghanistan) – In the Name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful! First of all, allow me on behalf of my delegation and the Islamic State of Afghanistan to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I also wish him and the distinguished Vice-Presidents every success in carrying out their extremely important task. I am convinced that this gathering will prove highly fruitful under their wise leadership.

Moreover, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to assure Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, whose work is devoted to the promotion of human well-being, of the cooperation and collaboration of the Islamic State of Afghanistan throughout this Session.

We profoundly admire the important work done by the ILO. The Report prepared by the Director-General for the present Session includes points of major importance, including the subject of assistance for the promotion of the free market economy and for the improvement and consolidation of social justice. Taken as a whole, the Report provides a favourable framework for the participants to share their exprериences. Similarly, the Director-General's Report on the Organisation's activities in 1991 indicates that the International Labour Organisation is making great efforts to improve social welfare and labour relations.

During the current Session, a great deal of attention is being given to matters such as workers' claims in the event of insolvency, the prevention of industrial disasters and the development of human resources. The discussion of the Director-General's Report will be of great assistance to member States in solving their labour problems. The items on our agenda are of exceptional importance, providing an opportunity for the participants in this Session to describe their problems and to determine practical solutions through joint efforts and cooperation.

As you have already heard, the recently established Islamic State of Afghanistan would like to introduce major political and social changes based upon the sacred religious principles of Islam. It would like to undertake efforts to raise the people's standard of living. So far as foreign policy is concerned, the Islamic State aspires to ensure its observance of all United Nations instruments, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and to maintain friendly and favourable relations with all nations. It advocates non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries and support for the basic rights of the disadvantaged and poor nations. Thus, the Islamic State is in favour of maintaining favourable relations on the grounds of Islamic principles with all nations, and specifically with neighbouring countries.

It thus follows that we are obliged, on the basis of Islam and its humanitarian and benevolent principles, to drawn the urgent attention of the world's nations to the continuing inhuman acts being committed in Bosnia-Hercegovina, the occupied Arab territories in Palestine, Myanmar and Kashmir.

As a consequence of the satellite, servile puppet regime which ran our country, despite great material resources, favourable natural conditions and an active and able-bodied workforce as well as other possibilities, is still counted among the least developed countries. I should also mention that owing to the creation of the communist satellite regime in 1978 and the inhuman and brutal aggression of the Red Army, our historic country suffered enormous losses and economic devastation. With the help of God Almighty the Afghan Mujahed nation, "Soldiers of the Holy War", stood bravely against these brutal acts, which fortunately were condemned by nations world wide. The Mujahedin began their holy Jihad and struggle, and after 14 long years of turmoil, sacrifice and devastation, with the help of God Almighty, the Islamic State become a reality, fulfilling the wishes of each individual in our country.

As the first delegate to this Conference of the Islamic State of Afghanistan I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to take advantage of this international forum to express our best wishes and thanks to those countries, organisations and individuals which are providing us urgently needed assistance and offering us their cooperation at this difficult time. We call upon the nations of the world to recognise our State.

As I mentioned earlier, as a result of the foreign aggression, human resources in Afghanistan have been depleted, and domestic production and exports have decreased by as much as 95 per cent. Moreover, approximately one million people died, and much of the skilled labour is now untraceable. Whether they were killed or moved to some foreign country is unknown. At the same time almost four million of our compatriots were disabled and handicapped, and five million more fled to foreign countries. Similarly, more than two million people were displaced, forced to move from their native places to reside elsewhere

It should be pointed out that the former communist regime by its nature made major budgetary allocations in order to ensure its own survival and to pursue its military aims. Accordingly, all international assistance was stopped and suspended. With the establishment of the Islamic State, however, we hope that this suspension of assistance will be ended so that the State may be enabled to rebuild the country. As we have already mentioned, because of the brutal and inhuman actions of the former communist regime, domestic production and per capita income have plummeted. We therefore are now requesting an assessment of all the damages and losses we suffered, with a view to receiving compensation for them.

In the current circumstances, as far as the reconstruction of Afghanistan is concerned, the newly established Islamic State is seeking assistance from other countries and international organisations in the following areas: (1). For the resettlement of migrants; (2). For the reconstruction of non-productive and suspended projects which have been suspended and which are designed to fulfil the basic needs of our people by providing them with basic necessities; (3). For the creation of new projects aimed at creating employment opportunities for migrants; (4). Measures to help prevent internal migration from the least developed areas by means of a well balanced economy; (5). The training of supervisory personnel in various fields; (6). The implementation of practical programmes in certain areas; (7). The introduction of mixed enterprises and private investments; (8). Mesures to attract foreign investment and to set up domestic and foregn enterprises; (9). Assistance in the reduction of bureacracy in state organisations; (10). Assistance in clearing minefields.

I should like to repeat that the Islamic State of Afghanistan fully supports all the activities and work of the International Labour Organisation. We will endeavour to observe all Conventions both ratified and unratified, and Recommendations as well, in accordance with Islamic principles.

We wish every possible success to the President and his Vice-Presidents and to all participating bodies.

Mr. HENDY (representative of the International Centre for Trade Union Rights) – The International Centre for Trade Union Rights welcomes the Report of the Director-General and congratulates the ILO on its work over the last year.

We congratulate the President on his election. We too welcome the end of the Cold War and the benefits this can bring for democracy and social justice across the globe. The peace dividend is capable of releasing the resources to fulfil these aspirations. There is, with the Earth Summit, some hope that the growing recognition that there needs to be greater equity in the apportionment and development of economic resources across the world will be translated into action.

It is true, as the Director-General observes, that there is a new climate of consensus on human rights. Yet we note that often this consensus is not translated into action so far as the rights of trade unions and trade unionists are concerned. In the developed countries there is a marked and significant tendency to introduce legislation which is intended to remove rights from trade unions and trade unionists, to undermine their effectiveness in protecting working people and to encourage employers not to bargain collectively but to impose terms and conditions of work. The United Kingdom is a case in point, contemptuously flouting the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). New Zealand provides another example.

In the developing countries assassination, imprisonment, disappearance, banning orders and the like persist. The examples are too numerous to cite but the recent imprisonment of union leader Chihana in Malawi and Noubir El Amaoui in Morocco cannot be overlooked. Outrages against trade unionists persist in the Middle East, in South-East Asia and in Latin America.

In Central and Eastern Europe the drive towards human rights and democracy has, so far as trade union rights are concerned, had an impact on the market economy. The notion of the economic market is in conflict with the notion of strong and free trade unions. This is not a point of theory but one of fact, demonstrable wherever the baying of the free marketeers has been heeded, for example, in Reagan's and Bush's United States, and in Thatcher's and Major's Britain. If the law of the market is not to become the law of the jungle in Eastern Europe, then the democratic forces, including the trade unions, in those countries must insist that their trade union laws reflect international labour Conventions and that those laws and Conventions are observed in practice. We agree with the Director-General that social security protection is a key element in assuring internal stability and social peace in the fragile new democracies, but it is our opinion that strong and autonomous trade unions operating within laws which give effect to international labour Conventions are in fact yet more important. We draw particular attention to the abuse of the law in Bulgaria, where not only have the assets of the unions been seized by the Government, but the subscriptions which continue to be paid by the members to their unions have been intercepted.

With the wind of democracy behind it, yet faced with a worldwide disregard of trade union rights, the international trade union movement must become, I believe, more unified. Certainly the world economy and the employers which dominate it are becoming more unified, and their strategy is global. The best way to protect working people and to ensure stability and a decent standard of living is strong trade unionism. Strong trade unionism entails unity. Such unity can enforce trade union rights, both through the ILO and independently of it. Only strong trade unionism can ensure that market forces operate within a legal framework which ensures that human needs and human freedoms and not simply greed and profit are given consideration.

The ICTUR calls on the ILO to continue its great work in attempting to balance the rights of employers, employees and the States in accordance with international laws which all should respect.

We trust that this year, which marks five years of the ICTUR's continued existence. We shall be in a position to celebrate the admission of the ICTUR to full status within the ILO. Only thus will we be able to play our full part in the ILO's work. We ask for your support in this matter.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ZAVALA COSTA (Employers' delegate, Peru) – It is a pleasure to take the floor in this illustrious assembly, on behalf of the Peruvian employers and my own behalf, to express my sincere and cordial greeting to the delegates of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I congratulate the President and the Vice-President and wish them luck. May I also extend my greetings to the Director-General and congratulate him for his very lucid and complete Report which will stimulate our debates.

The process of democratisation in member States, and the role of the ILO in this process, is doubtless one of the most important matters touched on in the past several years, as is indicated in the Report. We agree with the Director-General when he says that the ILO must do everthing within its reach to support democracy, given its fragile beginnings in many States, because in order to achieve social justice, it is indispensible to establish authentic democracy.

This is very true in the case of Peru where we are experiencing major economic and social difficulties, compounded by a falling-back in the consolidation of democracy as a result of the decision of the President, Alberto Fujimori, on 5 April last to suspend the Constitution as everyone know.

In the face of this political advance, the Confederation of Private Employers' Associations (CONFIEP), which I represent, made publicly known its rejection of the Government's attitude which infringed the Constitution and the democratic order. Nevertheless, as we said at the time, we are aware of the dangers facing the country. Terrorism and drug dealing are continually sapping the foundations of the state of law, along with poverty which is the result of years of erroneous management in our country. On the other hand, we cannot close our eyes to the argument constantly advanced by the State that the institutions were infiltrated by corrupt or interested parties seeking personal profit rather than the achievement of our national objectives.

Nevertheless, nothing can justify violating a constitution, because it is the only guarantee of the respect of basic rights. That is why from this tribunal of the labour world we demand the return to constitutionality as soon as possible, so that in legitimacy we can dedicate ourselves to overcoming this generalised crisis, and achieve our reintegration and gain the financial support of the international community which has cost us so much. We are thus pleased by the recent commitment of our President at the OAS gathering in the Bahamas, when he indicated he would convene a constituent assembly on 18 October next. We hope within a few months that Peru will have returned to the institutionalised democracy which is necessary for the balance of powers and all civil freedoms.

Many reasons have led our country to the situation in which it finds itself today. A basic issue is our labour policy. It is a sympfom of this that a resolution of the Court of Constitutional Guarantees, a supervisory body enshrined in the 1979 Constitution, which sought to reverse a central aspect of labour reform initiated in 1991, was used amongst other reasons as an argument by the Government against the viability of democracy. It is a matter of concern and also curious that large sectors of the population give majority support to the constitutional breakdown and reject a system which in their own words brought only corruption and hunger. There is clearly in all this an error of judgement. Our population, assailed as it is by the lack of employment, better wages and progress has identified its evils with democracy. It is indispensable to dissipate this confusion and establish a system where freedom and constitutional respect are inseparable from general well-being. We believe that the best defence which a constitutional regime can have is the respect of the citizen for the basic principles which inspire it. Here labour legislation plays a primary role and, as the Director-General has indicated, the ILO must do everything within its means to support democracy.

We consider it essential that international labour Conventions and standards take due account in particular of the need to adapt the legal system to the new realities resulting from modern economics, and ensure that they are flexible enough to permit their application in different realities. At the 1991 session of the Conference, the main subject was the informal sector and it will be recalled that we gave thought to the alarming figures which showed that in my country more that 50 per cent of work-hours are worked in that sector, i.e. outside the legal framework. This leads us to question the efficacy of the protective nature of the social legislation, which undermines the spirit of enterprise and acts as a brake on individual and group initiative.

Therefore, last year in my country, a wide-ranging and thorough transformation of individual labour relations was undertaken, based on a liberal model. This can be seen in an analysis of standards such as compensation for time of service, co-participation of workers in profits and co-management, paid rest, hours of work, and the Act to promote employment, which corrected our rigid standards on stability of employment on the basis of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No 158).

This reform, undertaken thanks to powers delegated by the Congress to the Executive, should not been questioned but needs be strengthened in the light of the changes affecting the global economy. These changes are consistent with the present trend referred to by the Director-General in his Report. Of course the change to an open economy may be a costly one. But the social and economic cost of interventionist and excessive protection policies are much higher and real. We are paying such a cost. It is indispensable therefore to deregulate and make labour legislation more flexible, ensuring that changes are accompanied by the appropriate social policy.

Within the changes which have to be introduced, we must guarantee the respect for freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. We must stimulate the autonomy of the social partners because this, in our opinion, is an essential aspect of any democratic process. Thus, the work which the ILO has carried out in this field is of fundamental importance and we must continue in this line in order to harmonise tendencies and to embody these ideas in international standards, which are appropriate to the needs of the times.

Aware of this responsibility, we consider that the ILO has been carrying out very important activities in respect of employment and development. As the Report says, we must stimulate full, productive and freely chosen employment. The highest priority in the developing countries is economic development. This priority must be shared by the ILO. Only economic growth and a solution to unemployment, underemployment and massive poverty will enable the developing countries to improve their situation and the wellbeing of their peoples. The ILO must focus on programmes of aid to the developing countries enabling them to solve their enormous social problems and economic problems. In the case of countries such as Peru, this is linked to the inescapable obligation to attenuate the effects of structural readjustment. The ILO is thus playing a major role in studying these problems and proposing solutions.

The need to find the best solutions to the economic, socialist, institutional crises in my country is one which the Peruvian entrepreneurs freely accept. We are aware that the search for labour prosperity will fail without the success of private enterprise, which is the source of labour and the corner-stone of the economy. Modern policies are based on the recognition that the worker/employer dichotomy is only a partial one and that their respective interests are shared rather than contrary. Shared viewpoints will ease the road towards economic and social development which we all desire and which is the basis of all solid democracies.

Lastly, we firmly believe that transformation and reform must satisfy the objectives of social justice in the framework of political and economic stability, concertation and democracy.

Mr. ATEKER (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Uganda) – It is with great pleasure and honour, on behalf of my country, my delegation and myself, that I take this opportunity to address this august meeting. First of all, let me congratulate the President, and the Vice-Presidents, on their election to preside over this Session of the International Labour Conference. Their competence so far shows that the Conference certainly will come to a successful conclusion.

This being my maiden speech at this forum, I cannot help but look back at the history of the International Labour Organisation. The Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO clearly describes the scenario facing workers in 1919. Our forefathers, then, witnessed a situation characterised by injustice, hardship and privation affecting large numbers of workers, and which produced so much unrest that the peace of the world was endangered. Since then, a lot of work has been done, but alas the situation is still characterised by injustice and hardship.

The theme chosen for this year's session is one of the fundamental principles of governance that has eluded country after country to the detriment of the people as a whole, and of workers in particular. Democratisation and the ILO is a theme which my country fully endorses. The general principle of democracy, namely government by consent and with the participation of all, is universally acceptable. But, for democracy firmly to be established in a society and for its practice to be entrenched as a culture of governance, it must develop within the context of individual societies, and must be based on the social systems pertaining to those countries. In our view, it is unrealistic to present democracy with artificial global uniformity. Like the concept of appropriate technology, democracy, too, must be judged in the context of its appropriateness to particular societies.

Whereas democratic practice in industrial countries has been propelled through technological and electronic development – for example, instantaneously reaching out to the electorate by radio and television – such a situation is hardly characteristic of developing countries.

In the Third World, reaching one's constituents is a laborious affair spanning over weeks, travelling by unreliable means, and addressing large audiences without microphones. In such differing circumstances, to expect two levels of democracy to move at the same pace is like starting a race between a cyclist and an aircraft, and expecting the two to reach the same destination at the same time. You can see for yourself the bewilderment and frustration of the cyclist and the iniquity of the competition. This introduces a catching-up psychology which is unattainable. Therefore, in our view, the only practical programme towards achieving the same objective of democracy must be to recognise the difference of velocity and level of development, then agree to travel in the same direction and cooperate with each other to achieve a harmonious, mutual and systematic relationship in the process of democratisation.

In our experience, since independence in 1962, we have seen a system of democracy, a military dictatorship, then a multi-party democracy once again. Today we have put in place a system which sometimes is described as "a no-party system". But, at least, the National Resistance Movement (NRM) which is people-based, has produced a ten-point political programme for the recovery of Uganda.

Since January 1986, the NRM has put in place a system of governance based on grass-root democracy and collegiate electoral hierarchy at a parliamentary level. Even the workers are to be represented in Parliament. The NRM has introduced a system of governance by the coalition of all national interests including all the political parties.

An era of national reconciliation has been established and I am happy to tell you that today it is not unusual for our President, President Museveni, to share the political platform with former leaders of Uganda. In other words, it is now becoming possible for a past Ugandan leader to leave power and stay in Uganda, protected by the Government that succeeds him. The spectacle of African leaders fleeing their countries after they are replaced should come to end.

However, the NRM is a transitional arrangement. There is a Constitutional Commission to work out a new constitutional arrangement, which must be in place by 1995.

In matters of economic relations between developed and developing countries the ILO, among others, can assist in creating the right climate. There has developed a tendency to tie economic cooperation to the practice of democracy as it is seen by the development partner, rather than as it is relevant to the recipient country. It is true that democracy is an effective vehicle for ushering in development. However, without the means for economic sustainance, conditions hostile to democratisation tend to overwhelm the social system. It would be more appropriate to tally economic cooperation with respect for human rights and to inject economic assistance into areas that facilitate economic growth and democratisation.

I would like to take this opportunity to express the gratitude of my country to the ILO for the various projects that it has assisted and promoted. Many projects have benefited from ILO programmes and there are many current programmes under way.

I will now briefly turn to the economic programme of Uganda. In addressing this subject, I remind you that we have gone through a tumultuous time – through the vagaries of war and bad leadership. One of the big tasks of the Government today has been to devise measures in support of the transition from economic recovery to economic development. Hoping to realise a positive change, the Government committed itself to liberalise the economy by allowing the private sector to flourish and bring about efficient allocation of resources through competition and sustainable growth. Consistent with this view, the Government introduced the Investment Code, 1991, to ease and clarify regulations on investment and to provide attractive incentives to both local and foreign investors. In addition, the Government is divesting itself of numbers of public enterprises – a decision which will create more jobs.

In 1972 the dictator Idi Amin expelled thousands of citizens and non-citizen Asians from Uganda and dispossessed them of their property. In recognition of human rights and the rights of ownership of private property, the Government of the NRM has returned this property to their rightful owners.

While our societies are doing everything possible to develop and build strong democratic institutions, there are a number of external factors which undermine them and we appeal to the ILO to help us to appeal to the rest of the world to cancel the burden of debt which we now have.

Finally, on the question of South Africa, my delegation would also like to add its voice to all peace-loving people calling upon the South African Government to remove all obstacles so that apartheid can be completely defeated. We appeal to all the other parties concerned to exercise maximum restraint during the negotiations so that a majority government is established there. For our part, we will continue to offer training places to young persons from South Africa in our vocational and educational institutions.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. MARMOLEJOS (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – The Dominican Republic Workers' delegation wishes to join in the congratulations expressed by all the preceding speakers to the President and Offficers of the Conference.

This meeting is taking place at a momentous time in history. Events of great importance have shaken the world in the last year, from sea to sea, from continent to continent, altering the balance of politics and power.

The changes in Eastern Europe and the break-up of the former USSR have shifted the tenor of dialogue and the context of political relations. The world quivers under the weight of large budgets and larger needs. Extremes stand out. At a time when peoples within their respective countries clamour for pluralism and democracy – in other words, for absolute respect for the rule of ideas and for individual freedoms we witness – a wave of conservatism, of discrimination against ethnic, political, generational and other minorities, and are tempted to conclude that the world only knows how to live in an extreme by polarised environment inevitably marked by conflict.

It is important in this conflict of extremes to highlight what happens in respect of wealth and poverty. We cannot deny that the minority of the wealthy has grown, but the number of the poor has grown as well, with twice as many living below the poverty line.

Today there is a monstrous accumulation of wealth in the hands of a few. Ten per cent of the population holds most of the income; this injustice is due, in part, to inflation, which has not been compensated for by a regular review of wages.

The wages paid today do not correspond to the worker's effort, and they certainly do not suffice to meet a family's basic needs.

Consequently, some 57 per cent of the world's population lives in poverty because 60 per cent of their income goes to purchase food.

The wealth of the poor countries is being transferred to the rich countries, as the poor countries have become net exporters of currency. This currency is used to buy goods which cannot be produced in the Third World, and to honour a debt which, pay back as you might, only seems to grow larger.

Over the past decade Latin American and Caribbean countries transferred more than US$200 million dollars abroad, and yet their external indebtedness increased by some $100,000 million, while investment fell by 35 per cent and per capita consumption by 13 per cent.

In order to bear this heavy burden our countries had to reallocate resources, punishing the population by driving down their quality of life.

No democracy can withstand a geometric increase in inflation while wages barely move and adjustment policies on implemented. The inevitable is therefore happening. The tepid democracies which sprang up in the 1980s are falling apart, torn by these perverse policies. At the same time, the productive apparatus of these countries is being torn apart as well: at the beginning of the 1980s growth was constant at 5 per cent GDP; today our economies are stagnant or in outright recession, and growth is barely 2 per cent per annum.

Adjustment and neoliberalist policies now in fashion seek to disengage the State as a moderating and redistributing agent, and argue that wealth should be channelled exclusively by market forces, subject only to the laws of supply and demand. The State is asked to do away with all subsidies, and to leave health, education, basic nutrition, etc., to the market. This policy, of course, is urged only on the underdeveloped, because the rich countries continue to subsidise basic items and to apply protectionist policies.

After the harm done to the economies of the poor countries and the sacrifices imposed on their poorest segments, it is proposed that we give development a human face, that industry be restructured.

It is proposed that we reconvert our industry, that we open our markets, that we compete more aggressively on international markets. Some seek to compete by using cheap labour in conditions approximating slavery.

Others are prepared to take up the gauntlet of competition, recasting their policy in order to train their human resources, to improve their education, to enhance productivity and efficiency, and to produce more and better that which we know how to produce.

Our trade union movement agrees with the multilateral opinion that development is not merely economic growth, but also human growth and development. We thus reject the mechanistic and cruel approach to adjustments, which is excluding most of the earth's population from the world's markets.

In my country, matters are no better than they are anywhere else. There is an alarming increase in poverty, a vertiginous increase in unemployment, and a 34 per cent rate of illiteracy; 84 per cent of the population does not own its own housing, and much of it is undernourished.

In this precarious situation, after 30 years of struggle, the Dominican Republic has finally adopted a new labour code; its scope is limited as regards economic and social aspects, but it is comprehensive in the protection of trade union rights, as it protects trade union leaders from dismissal, in numbers proportionate to the number of employees in the enterprise. This Code represents what was possible, what the relative weight of the social partners made possible, what struggle, dialogue, concertation and consensus made possible.

There as yet remain many difficulties for this Labour Code to have its impact. We still have free trade areas and export-processing zones where democracy goes by the board when the workers try to organise.

Palpable proof of this intolerance was offered by the Government itself when on 21 August 1990 it sacked 2,600 employees of the state-run electric power company, including the leaders of SITRACODE, with a view to breaking the union.

Notwithstanding the two years that have passed and the Government's pledge to rehire 25 per cent of the trade union leaders, it has not yet done so. This clearly shows that the Government meant to destroy the union. But such tactics run up against the people's solidarity and their democratic power.

Who would have thought that so many problems could arise in so little time? We are tired of bearing the heavy burden of social injustice. In the midst of such difficulty and privatisation, hope still stirs in our dreams; we still dare to court optimism, and to dream of a fairer world and a better tomorrow.

We hope that this session of the Conference will help to bring about this worthy ideal.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL KOUBEISI (Employers' delegate, Iraq) – In The Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! It is my pleasure to greet you and to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this session. His competence and qualifications are the very best warrant of the achievement of the goals and aspirations of the ILO, in the common interests of the three social partners. I have the honour also to convey the very best greetings of the employers of Iraq, a land of human civilisation, and to which I add my own wishes for the success of this session.

This session is being held in international conditions which are highly complex and dangerous. The dramatic events of these last two years have given a different picture from the one which was in the imagination of mankind concerning the new world order. These events have shown that coercion and force are now being made use of in international relations, when States with the upper hand in this order launched an aggressive war against Iraq, the victims of which were tens of thousands of citizens, mostly children, women and the elderly and which completely destroyed the infrastructure and numerous factories in Iraq. Production has suffered enormously and the employers feel concern about the future of the national industry, an industry which has prospered in the previous years.

The items on the agenda of this session and in particular the Report of the Director-General on Democratisation and the ILO, deal with the most important topics and problems of the labour production process. Democracy and human rights are the best guarantees for the prosperity of this process because they are elements of political and economic stability. The economic embargo and the political pressure being suffered by Iraq are totally contradictory with economic principles, and violate man's most basic rights.

All the justifications for this iniquitous embargo, now in its third year, have disappeared. At present the only remaining reasons are political and designed to impose hegemony and interference in the internal affairs of the Iraqi people. These are violations of democratic principles and human rights. Where are human rights and where is the democracy which this new world system supposedly proclaims? Where are all these flamboyant slogans now that disaster has fallen on the Iraqi people following the prohibition placed on it gaining access to foodstuffs and medical help? Who caused the death of tens of thousands of Iraqis as a result of hunger or sickness? Where are the slogans when we see what has happened in the occupied Arab territories, in southern Lebanon?

This world system seeks to impose its hegemony on States by making them adopt ready-made resolutions of the Security Council. Thus resolutions were adopted on the continuation of the embargo, which led to the closure of plants because of a shortage of raw materials and spare parts. Unemployment and underemployment have increased, despite the assistance granted by the Federation of Iraqi Industrialists, the General Confederation of Labour and the Labour and Social Security Office. We are living under the threat of a human disaster and production is in an impasse; the ILO should therefore intervene and demand the lifting of the embargo against Iraq, an embargo which has put a stop to the production process and brought starvation and death to hundreds of thousands of Iraqis. So from this rostrum we appeal to the social partners of all countries of the world to fight against this embargo and demand that it be lifted. The new world order was not content simply to impose an embargo against Iraq. It used this method to impose its hegemony on other States. It used the big stick against the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. Last April it adopted a resolution to impose an air and military ambargo on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya without any legal basis, whereas the hegemonistic and dominant States in the world adopted no serious measures against the entities and States which challenge the international community and do not respect the resolutions of that same Security Council.

The question of structural adjustment and human resources development on the agenda of this session of the Conference is of great importance. It gives rise to ideas and concepts for restructuring, training, skills and greater increase. We would like to support the conclusion which invites the ILO to play a greater role in supporting training and technical cooperation programmes, particularly in the developing countries which have a great need for such support. The other items on the agenda meet the needs of the labour movement and production and we are sure that the results of this session will give us the necessary legal instruments and framework to deal with the various questions being dealt with.

Finally, I should like to wish every success to our Conference and hope that it will achieve the goals of the International Labour Organisation.

Original – Russian: Mr. PONOMAREV (Employers' delegate, Ukraine) – Allow me to associate myself with the congratulations that have been addressed to the President and to the Officers of the Conference on their election to their responsible offices and to express my certainty that under their guidance this Session will successfully complete its work.

The Director-General's Report offers a detailed and expert analysis of the radical changes now taking place in the democratisation of public life and state institutions throughout the international community. The assessment of the transformations taking place in the countries of central and eastern Europe is correct. I agree as well with the Report's thesis, which emphasises that "the transition promises to be at least as difficult on the economic as on the political scene..." According to the Report, "No effort must therefore be spared to prevent the hopes born of political liberalisation from being frustrated by upheavals in the economy".

An important practical conclusion follows from this argument – namely that a national economy consists of the total of the economic activity of each of its individual components. It is in this context that I shall later describe some of the practical results that have been achieved by the industrial association which I have the honour to represent.

The report addresses a broad range of economic and social problems. I am impressed, for example, by the inter-relationship of matters such as employment and health, and employment and vocational training. Other very important elements of democracy are also mentioned, such as social protection, independent trade unions and the system of collective bargaining.

The theme of the Report proposed for our consideration at this Session is of the utmost interest. The analysis is particularly important when applied to newly sovereign States. Among such States, Ukraine stands out because of its major industrial potential. However, the Ukrainian economy must undergo extensive renewal and reform. Universally acknowledged democratic standards in the system of industrial management and the organisation of labour relations must serve as a basis for this change.

This process is taking place in very complicated conditions, with the very structure of production, the nature of ownership and productive relations undergoing profound changes. The status of the enterprise itself has changed radically. Instead of being strictly subordinated, as in the past, to ministries and government departments, they now enjoy a broad measure of independence. But this also means that the position of the enterprise shall now be determined solely according to the bottom line of its own activity and its ability to work on its own initiative. In these circumstances, the world of work runs up against a number of acute problems, such as temporary drops in production and economic hardship, thus forcing many of our enterprises to lay off large numbers of workers, with all the consequences that entails.

It is very important, we believe, that the process of democratisation should not become a limited administrative measure, conducted only at the upper levels of management. The new democracy at work must mean radically new approaches to the quality of one's work and the ability to take one's own decisions in the interests of the enterprise. Our democratically elected labour collective has decided to put an end to political activity in our enterprise. This democratic measure makes it possible for us to focus our entire attention on social and labour activity. Now we need to have a grasp of different situations and an ability to find new solutions in what are already difficult circumstances.

Some results can now be seen in our scientific and industrial association, which is one of the largest manufactures of electrical appliances in Ukraine.

We have, above all, succeeded in ensuring stable production by forestalling problems and taking the necessary decisions to guarantee the continuity of production.

I would like to stress that this is not an easy task, as things stand today. The essential principle of democracy can only be instilled in the collective consciousness through practical application not rhetoric – people need to believe in their work, in their future. On this basis, the important concept of the participation of all persons, in the interests of the enterprise is being created. To avoid democracy becoming merely a slogan, it must be built upon people's confidence in the future. Only a healthy economic situation can create a sound basis for the work of a labour collective. So, we are introducing, more and more, the idea that at the root of any process lie results and production, and that the considerable resources we are planning to spend this year on social programmes are generated only in industry.

Our association comprises a number of large and medium-sized enterprises as well as a highly qualified design department. Each of these units enjoys a high degree of independence and is free to use its economic initiative. This approach began long before the present reforms and has facilitated the transition to the concept of the market, and to operating according to the processes already introduced. Aware of the irreversibility of the transition to a market economy, we showed a new spirit of enterprise through the structural changes made within our association, in the creation of small enterprises, industrial cooperatives and other autonomous structures. We have set up a marketing board. This kind of economic management is a practical expression of the principle of economic democracy, and the encouragement of initiative at the level of individual enterprises and groups of workers, and provides for material incentives. The association is a member of the Ukrainian Alliance of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs.

Bearing in mind the broad range of questions raised in the Report, I would like to point out that our understanding of democratisation is in terms of the priority we have given to social policy. This refers to the broad-based participation of enterprises in housing construction, in providing major subsidies to material programmes, in funding on-the-job labour protection and technical safety programmes, occupational safety and health and public catering.

Thus, social programmes are becoming a concrete manifestation of the process of democratisation, as indicated in the chapter of the Report on "Social protection".

I am speaking as the representative of one Ukrainian enterprise. We and our nascent State are experiencing identical difficulties. We want stability and peace, we want normal conditions of work, and these are our goals. I can say with pride that our collective has fully preserved the spirit of friendship. We have no discrimination of any kind, there is no division according to nationality, although we have several dozen nationalities represented amongst us.

We understand that we are only at the beginning of the complex process of the democratisation of society. But, we must run the full course, not deviate and certainly not turn back. We believe that is the way it will be and we are relying on the support of the entire international community.

Original – French: Mr. N'GOM (Minister of Labour and Vocational Training, Senegal) – It is a pleasure for me to join in the congratulations which have been addressed to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on the occasion of his highly deserved election to the Presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to congratulate the other Officers on the Conference whose contribution will indeed be valuable on the accomplishment their lofty task.

I am sure that, thanks to the President's competence and eminent qualifications, the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference will constitute a major step in the strengthening of the vast work of the International Labour Organisation, which strives to attain freedom, social justice and peace. I should therefore like to assure him of the support and cooperation of my entire delegation.

I should also like to express from this rostrum the great esteem of Senegal for the International Labour Office and its Director-General. My country will continue, as always, to coopeerate as a loyal partner.

As in previous years, the Report which the Director-General has submitted to our Conference sets forth the activities of our Organisation in the course of the past year. However, in dealing with the theme, Democratisation and the ILO, the Director-General has made not only a relevant and highly topical choice, but has also reminded the world that, as a repository of the social conscience of mankind, our Organisation is responding to the tremendous hopes being raised by the irreversible wave of freedom sweeping across the earth.

From this point of view, the Report this year is particularly significant.

Senegal has placed its hopes on man as a goal for development and firmly believes that the ILO can continue making a contribution to its member States which is both positive and decisive in the democratisation process under way.

Indeed the standard-setting activities of the ILO have given the world a first-rate legal arsenal which is a source of undying inspiration; its impact on the humanisation of labour relations lends further support to the Organisation's mission to defend the dignity of man and fundamental freedom is as vital for democracy as is breath for life.

In Senegal, we have never considered that democracy should be linked to the level of development or to the level of national integration.

Our entire history, in fact, has been that of a struggle for the enhancement of fundamental freedoms and this since the historic gathering of Versailles, since we acceded to international sovereignty. Our National Charter guarantees freedoms and has institutionalised them; and they are fully exercised and monitored by our citizens.

We can therefore affirm that, despite some ups and downs, our democratic culture is deeply anchored in Senegal and pluralism – both political and trade union pluralism – exists in our country.

But as the Director-General said, democracy is a dynamic concept which evolves unceasingly with the passage of time. It is the slow and difficult construction of a political, economic and social system which must be based on tolerance, justice and the seeking of joint solutions. That is why Senegal, which today is experiencing a coalition government, is proud to have been able to help to create democratic movements in Africa by organising the Pan-African Conference on democracy and the mastery of transition.

This Conference, held from 25 to 28 May last, grouped more than 200 political leaders from 42 African countries belonging to 53 parties in power and 57 opposition parties. It constituted a break with the past and a turning-point; a break with the old order marked by authoritarianism, dictatorships and personal powers; and a turning-point in that Africans are now determined to commit themselves to a pluralist democracy and, on the eve of the year 2000, to assume their destiny themselves, thus ensuring that their continent has its rightful place within the family of nations.

On this occasion, they recognised the universality of the fundamental principles of democracy and the need to ensure a successful transition from monolism to pluralism – which involves official recognition of a real opposition, a national charter of democracy and the organisation of free elections providing for a changeover of political parties by peaceful means.

Such steps must be supported by institutions to defend and promote democracy – such as a Pan-African observation centre to monitor the transition and an African mediation committee which the Conference decided should be established in the near future.

The conclusions of this Conference, contained in the Dakar Declaration, provided a consensus framework to serve as a code of conduct for the parties to respect in order to render this dynamic concept of democracy irreversible. At this point, I think we must emphasise the need for the international community to support and encourage the process thus started in Africa. The ILO should – as it is today in Central and Eastern Europe and in Latin America – be more involved in the process of transition on the African continent.

In this context, I should like to suggest that we might – in order to accelerate the democratisation of social relations – organise a round table in Africa on social dialogue and vocational relations, similar to the one organised last March in Santiago for Latin America.

For its part, Senegal has committed itself to consolidating democracy by giving a new impetus to the dimension of participation and giving back the regions their financial and political autonomy – further to their administrative autonomy which already existed.

There is a fact, however, that remains. The evolution of democratic process is neither linear nor irreversible. Democracy is a quest for the absolute and therefore requires protection, monitoring and constant commitment by its supporters – nationally and internationally. The Director-General is absolutely right when he says that "the aspiration for a free society has not eclipsed the desire for a just society."

Similarly, President Diouf, who is coordinator of the summit group of consultation and South-South cooperation, known as the "Group of Fifteen", published a document stating the group's position on 4 May in Dakar as a contribution to the advent of a new world order.

The document gives an analysis of the present era which is characterised by fast changes marking the end of the East-West confrontation, the progressive settling of regional conflicts and of the advance of democracy – all of which are prospects which foster dialogue and cooperation so that a new visage of international cooperation in favour of development may be created.

There is no doubt that development cannot be separated from human rights and civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, all of which pave the way towards democratic transition, a state of law, political and trade union pluralism and a healthy growth of market economies.

We must not lose sight of the fact that poverty, unemployment, underdevelopment, illiteracy, epidemics, massive violations of human rights and freedoms, xenophobia, racism, drug-trafficking, terrorism and the deterioration of the environment, are all obstacles to democracy, lasting development and peace and stability in the world.

May I be allowed, before concluding, to refer to a problem which is of the greatest concern to my country: that of occupational safety and health, of particular relevance is the item on the agenda of this year's Conference concerning the prevention of industrial disasters. My country was unfortunate enough this year to experience a major industrial disaster when an ammonia tank explosed in a peanuts' processing company.

Despite the legal and legislative regulations machinery available to us, this disaster led to many victims because of a lack of knowledge – particularly of the risks inherent in the handling of certain dangerous chemical products. Thus, we need the support of the international community, particularly of the ILO, to carry out valid programmes of information and awareness for our social partners.

Apart from this painful event, Senegal has undertaken a vast programme of social relations by reforming its social legislation to improve social relations and collective bargaining.

We hope therefore that the ILO will be able to strengthen its action towards democratisation, the struggle against poverty, and the promotion of employment under the aegis of tripartism which, assuredly, as was pointed out by the Director-General, is "the transposition in to social relations of the principles underlying political democracy."

If the true mission of the ILO is to promote social justice and peace throughout the world, tripartism is certainly its privileged instrument in a world which is fast changing.

Original – Vietnamese: Mr. TRAN DINH (Government delegate, Viet Nam) – First and foremost I would like to express my warm greetings to Mr. Nascimento Rogrigues, President of the Social and Economic Council of Portugal, and congratulate him on his unanimous election to the Presidency of this important session of the International Labour Conference. I believe that with his experience and talent the work of this Conference will be successful. I would also like to congratulate those who have been elected as Officers of the Conference.

I wish to convey to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the International Labour Office, our sincere thanks for his cooperation and assistance and those of his colleagues for making it possible for the Vietnamese delegation to attend this Conference. Sincerely, I would also like to express our gratitude to the delegates at this Conference for welcoming us on our reintegration to this important international Organisation.

As a member of the ILO, Viet Nam will have more opportunities for the furtherance of its international cooperation, especially in the sphere of labour and social affairs. The Vietnamese delegation has been listening with great interest to the introduction and evaluation of the Reports of the Chairman of the Governing Body and the Director-General of the ILO. These reports have touched on important, essential and burning problems of the labour sphere in almost all countries, including Viet Nam.

The solution to poverty, the creation of employment – which is in conformity with socio-economic development and population growth – the management of and solution to migration movements, the reduction of imbalances in various socio-economic fields and during structural economic adjustment, the raising of living standards and protection of the dignity of millions of people; all these have been and will continue to be the concern of our Organisation. Tripartism has been placed at the heart of labour relations especially by governments in developing countries in transition.

Viet Nam, for various reasons, remains poor and underdeveloped. However, since the 1980s, and especially from 1986 onwards, Viet Nam has been conducting energetic and comprehensive modernisation policies in its socio-economic life. As an initial but important result, a multi-component commodity economy is emerging and shifting towards the market mechanism; consequently the inflation rate is being reduced and contained. Workers' requirements for foodstuffs and consumer goods are more successfully met and progress has been made in international relations and economic ties with foreign countries. This paves the way for the implementation of modernisation and development policies in the socio-economic sphere.

In recent years, great changes have taken place in many countries. The lives of hundreds of millions of people in dozens of countries have been affected by structural economic adjustment and a rapid movement towards the market mechanism. Although this is a common trend, stemming from the dynamics of development of the world economy, as well as of international economic relations, a whole series of pressing labour and social problems have emerged and require effective solutions, such as social protection, poverty alleviation, the abolishment of social evils and the democratisation of labour relations through tripartism.

In Viet Nam, in order to solve the above-mentioned problems and to contribute to the modernisation of the country, our Government has recognised that it is the responsibility of the State to create jobs and employment opportunities. Indeed, our country has a national employment creation programme and annually allocates an appropriate percentage of its budget to help people create employment. Workers are free to exercise their trades and to find employment; and businessmen who are in possession of capital and technology are encouraged by the State to run businesses and strengthen cooperation with other social partners; and, in accordance with law, they have the right to hire labour.

We are carrying out reforms in our wage and social insurance systems. The Government of Viet Nam is making a great effort to establish labour legislation. However, despite initial successes, we are coming up against many difficulties. We are also finding it hard to train experts for labour management in market mechanisms.

Given this situation, we hope to be able to benefit from the cooperation and assistance of member States of the ILO and the International Labour Office, with a view to overcoming these difficulties. In this way, we might fulfil the modernisation needs of our country and the legitimate demands of our workers.

I do hope that the following few wishes of my delegation will be taken note of and favourably considered by the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General, and that they might find some response – as they do not only concern Viet Nam.

Firstly, it is necessary to further strengthen or give higher priority to assistance to developing countries which are undergoing structural economic adjustment and shifting to the market mechanism. Attention should be focused on human resources development, job creation, the formulation of a system of labour laws and the training of managerial staff.

Secondly, alongside the growing tendency of regional cooperation, the Governing Body and the Director-General should further consolidate and encourage ILO regional activities. We believe that the regional thematic exchanges of experiences on such issues as human resources development, minimum wages, reform of social insurance, etc., would be highly beneficial to all.

Now that it is committed to modernisation of its policies, Viet Nam would like to express its wish to be integrated in the international community, including the ILO, through mutual cooperation and assistance for development and social progress.

As an ILO member, we shall have a greater opportunity for strengthening international cooperation in the labour and social sphere and will join in common efforts to find solutions to problems of world concern.

Mr. YANKANA (Employers' delegate, Guyana) – The employers of Guyana would like to associate themselves with the congratulations on his election already expressed from this rostrum to the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. We recognise that the President and his able Vice-Presidents are persons of distinguished careers in the service of international understanding.

Once again, we share in this august gathering of statesmen, employers and workers, as the world moves from one conventional wisdom to another. It was not so long ago that the world was confronted with opposing ideas, one of which directed the ownership and control of resources. Some argued for state control while many of us held on, sometimes tenuously, to private intitiative, private ownership and the interplay of market forces.

In Guyana, over a period of 20 years, the basic areas of the economy passed into state ownership and the private sector was severely cut in size. The State became ever present in the lives of our people. Contacts with revolutionary regimes in Eastern Europe and in the Far East replaced some of the long-standing connections in trade, investment and culture which had been built up over decades with Western Europe and North America.

State control brought a decline in the exploitative viability of our natural resources of sugar, bauxite and rice. Difficulties in maintaining production levels brought with them reduced foreign earnings which in turn meant delayed capital replacement, lower wages, less income from taxes, which again affected the quality of the country's social infrastructure.

The growth of the informal market, a subject more than adequately analysed last year in the Director-General's Report, reached enormous dimensions, strangulating the formal sector.

We are all familiar with these repercussions, the conditions which precede all structural adjustment recovery programmes. The small private sector persevered, and today the swing of the conventional wisdom that an economy led on by market forces and less regulation is the way to go, following the demise of the controlled economies in Eastern Europe, has given us a new lease on life.

In our country, we have begun to see the wisdom of private ownership and less government. The productive sector has shown commendable growth and there is an optimistic sense of achievement among our workers. I did not come here to talk only about frustration, low investment, unemployment and all the tasks which we face as employers during structural adjustment programmes.

The private sector in Guyana has lost thousands of skilled workers to emigration, mainly to other Caribbean countries and to North America. Member companies in our Confederation have been engaged in comprehensive training programmes stretching from induction courses to management development courses. We have also provided courses in maintenance and information technology. Many employees are trained at company expense and, although some of these have migrated because they have become more marketable, the process of training has continued. Hence we welcome the inclusion on the Conference agenda of item VI – adjustment and human resource development.

Our employers have come to realise that the cake of profit must be divided in such a way that owners and workers enjoy a reasonable share, leaving sufficient to finance the growth and expansion of enterprises. During periods of high inflation, it was comforting for the private sector to know that its members were able to increase employees' earnings sufficiently to cover costs without the need for trade union intervention and confrontation.

The private sector in my country has been referred to as "the engine of growth". Growth for us means growth with equity. The private sector therefore wants to share actively in the management of better health facilities, in the development of appropriate education and in the increase of the capabilities of our workers by training, in the expansion of employment with better paid jobs. The private sector in such an environment cannot merely react to laws and decisions, it must be treated by government as a partner; it must therefore be concerned with the defence of human rights, with the holding of regular elections and with the conduct of elections without reproach.

We employers come here annually and we work on a tripartite basis to debate common issues. One thing that we can take with us from this experience is the fact that in our respective countries, where we face the common enemies of unemployment, low wages and slow growth, we have the experience that will enable the three social partners to attack these problems with understanding and in the same spirit of unity with which we debate our issues here.

I feel that the time is right for me to refer to a quotation of an employer member of a country to this august Conference some years ago. He said: "The defeat of poverty comes at the end and not at the beginning of economic development. In a modern society, poverty is more a social than an economic condition. The greatest opportunities for development now lie in undoing the policies that have not worked, policies which strangled free enterprise and free competition. Recovery rather than development is therefore likely to be the priority for the next few years."

On behalf of my delegation and on behalf of the employers of my country, Guyana, I concluded by wishing you and this Conference every success and I thank you for this opportunity afforded me to address this plenary of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. KUDDO (Minister of Labour, Estonia) – On behalf of the Government and the delegation of the Republic of Estonia, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President and the Vice-Presidents of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am certain that their leadership will make this Session a successful and productive one.

I am very glad to represent my country – the Republic of Estonia – here in the annual International Labour Conference for the first time after the Second World War and after achieving independence from the Soviet Union in August 1991.

The Republic of Estonia joined the ILO in 1921 and took part in the International Labour Conference first in October 1921. Between 1920-40, Estonia ratified 22 International Labour Conventions. When studying the regulative Acts of that time concerning labour law and social policy, one can say that they were most advanced for the time, especially as regards leave, pensions and child benefits, etc.

The membership of the independent Republic of Estonia in the ILO was restored in January 1992. This involves a lot of obligations and responsibilities before the international assembly.

After the well-known historic events in 1940 in the Baltic countries, the economic and political development of Estonia was radically changed for half a century. One characteristic of the latter was that the economy, labour relations and social development of Estonia were made completely dependent on the processes in the Soviet Union. For instance, in 1991, Estonian exports to the countries in the rouble zone and the Republics of the Soviet Union accounted for 95 per cent of the total; similar imports totalled 85 per cent. In the 1930s these figures were around 4-5 per cent.

Economic and political changes in the above-mentioned region and, above all, in Russia (related with the economic collapse), the loss of most of the Eastern markets, the shortage of resources and difficulties in restructuring the economy as well as the reorientation to other markets have led to serious problems in employment and the social sphere. Quite new and serious problems for us now face the Estonian Government which need to be solved.

The industrial output of Estonia has decreased by 33 per cent in a year. And this is only the beginning. In June we intend to introduce our own currency – the Estonian crown. This will lead, as in East European countries, to an additional loss of the Eastern market and rapidly increasing unemployment.

For the first time in April-May 1991, after a lapse of 50 years, we started to register the number of unemployed people and pay them unemployment benefits. Though the number of unemployed registered officially is approximately 4,000 today and that of jobseekers over 10,000 – the total labour force of Estonia is approximately 800,000 – there is already considerable hidden unemployment. The problem is that nearly 85 per cent of the labour force are presently occupied in the State-owned sector where, regardless of the shortage of work, people are kept on as employed and often even paid salaries, even though many have been sent on so-called collective leave. Enterprises still hope that they will somehow manage to obtain raw materials and markets, or that the Government will start to buy their production and look for markets.

Another problem is that, in addition to economic and social aspects, we have to take into consideration the aspects of nationalities in our labour policy. During the postwar years hundreds of thousands of people of other nations were sent from other regions of the Soviet Union to Estonia. Today the share of non-Estonians is nearly 40 per cent of the total population. In former times, they worked mostly in so-called Union-subordinated enterprises – that is enterprises which were subordinated not to the Estonian Government but to the Soviet Union ministries, including the Ministry of Defence, which found a market for them, decided on such matters as output, etc. By today both the Soviet Union and these ministries have disappeared but the people – almost 60,000 – and factories with outdated production fully based on their markets are still in Estonia. The number of jobseekers is biggest in the mono-structured town and regions, and the problem has also a national colouring.

Due to the rapid dismissal of employees, the employment of young people will become a serious problem this summer. There are over 20,000 of these who will graduate from universities or vocational schools this year. They started their studies several years ago when needs for specialists were quite different and there was no talk of a market economy. Now these young people find themselves in a vacuum, where it appears that nobody needs them. In our society it is psychologically quite a new problem which is difficult for people to accept. There are no economic possibilities for the massive retraining of people, all the more since it is impossible to forecast the need for specialists in individual specialities even in the near future.

A problem which is much more acute than unemployment is the fast decline in the standard of living. Estonia was the first part of the Soviet Union to introduce a liberalisation of prices under administrative control in 1990. Today about 10 per cent of prices – mainly of natural resources, energy resources, some foodstuffs and medicines – are controlled by the Government. Other prices are determined by the market.

However, the liberalisation of prices has led to a galloping inflation and decline in the standard of living. For example, the cost-of-living index in the first quarter of 1992 was 26 per cent higher than that of the first quarter of 1991. The cost of foodstuffs has risen 38 per cent, fuel 40-50 per cent, housing costs nearly 70 per cent. Household incomes, however, have risen much less; the average wage nearly 6 per cent. Since we have not been able to influence the issuing of roubles (they are printed by the Central Bank of Russia), we have not yet been able to guarantee even the payment of wages, pensions and benefits over the last months since there is not enough cash. Thus everyone believes that we must introduce an Estonian currency as soon as possible.

The present economic situation is a serious trial for our people. The Government has tried to keep the tax burden on relatively low level, so that it does not exceed 36 per cent of the GDP. We are also trying, unlike Russia and many other former Soviet Union constituent Republics, to keep our budget in balance and not to take big foreign loans.

In the present situation the Government of the Republic of Estonia is facing serious problems. In the field of labour relations and the labour market, we are trying to work out as fast as possible a new labour legislation that will meet international requirements and those of the ILO. A lot of work has to be done in building up the social aid system and employment infrastructure, including the training of specialists. The problems can be solved, in our opinion, primarily by promoting new entrepreneurship and small businesses, in particular by creating the most favourable conditions for investment and for individual initiative.

The famous scientist, Albert Einstein, called the building of socialism in the Soviet Union the greatest social experiment in the history of mankind. I think that the next stage – how to proceed from socialism to capitalism or, more accurately, to a socially-oriented market economy society – will not be of less importance. We have little experience in this and the steps taken by East European countries cannot be directly copied either. It will probably take a long time to carry out radical structural changes both in our economy and in society as a whole. International assistance and support, including from the ILO, are of considerable importance here.

Original – French: Mr. MAINA (Government delegate, Chad) – I should like on behalf of my Government and the delegation which is attending the Conference with me to congratulate warmly the President for his highly deserved election to preside over this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. His intellectual qualifications and his considerable experience in the field of labour which have motivated his election are all assurances of the fortunate outcome of our work. I wish him every possible success in his new task.

Similarly, I would extend very warm greetings on behalf of my delegation to all the other delegations – to the observers and special guests – present here. May I be allowed particularly to congratulate the Director-General for the quality of his very detailed Report, which will constitute the basis for discussion at this Conference, and for the importance of the items on the agenda.

Indeed, it is fitting to emphasise how very relevant it is to discuss topical issues within this Conference, particularly that of democratisation and the ILO itself.

ILO meetings are a highly appropriate framework for reflection on this question and for in-depth examination of future prospects, for various reasons.

First of all, the tripartite composition of the delegations fosters to a considerable extent the exchange of ideas among governments, employers and workers. The solution of democratic problems depends to a great extent on the contributions which they can make in their respective spheres of influence. Indeed, you cannot speak of an economic system unless there are structures for dialogue and participation to enable the discussion of fundamental options.

Next, its status of international agency specialised in questions of the fundamental rights of all citizens places the ILO in a privileged situation to deal with questions which reach beyond the territorial borders of countries and demand the resolution of all the nationals which make up the international community.

Finally, common reflection will stress the ILO's own task in this field with a view to more efficient action.

Our world has for some time been undergoing changes which show the will of nations for true democracy guaranteeing individual and collective freedom. The problems posed have been the subject of in-depth debate in my country.

It is true that democracy is linked to economic development and it is impossible to achieve durable development without taking account of the democratic process.

For the Government of the Republic of Chad, which was set up on 20 May 1992, democracy is part of its major concerns. In this respect the objective are security, dialogue and social well-being, inter alia.

Chad has suffered only too much from wars and settling of scores and it has realised that the use of arms is not the best way to put an end to our differences. Under the previous regime, the slightest comment was assimilated to opposition and treated as such with dire consequences for the author.

In order to put an end to the painful experiences of war the Patriotic Salvation Movement (MPS) took action on 1 December 1990. It promised true, total and pluralist democracy which would take account of the aspirations of the people. This democracy was the indispensable condition for the improved well-being of the citizens and for the achievement of social justice and, as a corollary, durable peace.

Should we recall here that the enemies of democracy in Chad have never ceased to put spokes in the wheel of the Government, making it impossible for it to achieve its programme of action.

The Government is nevertheless determined to lead Chad along the path to democratisation and that is why a new Government team has been set up by national consensus, in which opposition parties and trade unions both figure.

According to the provisions of the National Charter granting to all citizens of Chad freedom of opinion and the right to form political parties and other groups, as of now ten political parties have been authorised to operate in my country.

In other words, Chad is honestly playing the democratic game in an ongoing and constructive manner in order to find an acceptable solution to the problems of all. This task will not be easy. The requirements of democratisation together with a financial crisis which is unprecedented seem to be beyond the real possibilities of my country and call for international solidarity. The assistance of the ILO in this field will be welcome.

A nation can only participate in the management of public affairs and express its thoughts in peace and quiet. It is on that condition alone that there can be an improvement in the well-being of the population.

For a population which is 80 per cent agricultural one and 70 per cent illiterate, the Government of my country intends on the one hand to set up an economic plan adapted to ensure harmonious regional development and the creation of employment and the other hand to plan education and training with a view to eliminating illiteracy through the promotion of national languages.

The way of economic development must be closely linked to social development and political stability. The Government therefore calls upon all political and apolitical consciences to ensure the social and economic enhancement of the country.

Furthermore, the disorganisation of the modern sector of production due to the destruction of the very few existing industries during the civil war of 1979 contributed to the development of the informal sector in urban and rural areas. This sector was hitherto fairly unknown in Chad because no studies were available. Thus the Government has called upon the international community to ensure the promotion of that sector. Emphasis has been placed on the development of micro-enterprises.

In view of the importance of the informal sector, we must get to know it better so as to make better use of it.

As to the rural sector, it will above all be a question of protecting, increasing and diversifying production and of encouraging activities for the development and transformation of craft industries. In order to achieve this goal, such modernisation must take into account national know-how.

Let me recall that these projects will be illusory if they do not rely on the interested parties themselves. Indeed, the Government has this year organised a national consultation on association and cooperative movements in Chad, thanks to the assistance of the UNDP and the ILO. This consultation is the expression of true democracy. For five days the target representatives of the population, the donors, the NGOs and the Government met together to debate problems of associations and cooperatives.

I would like to seize this opportunity to express to the ILO, to the UNDP and to the other international organisations the gratitude of the Government of Chad for their contribution to the achievement of this important meeting. Because of the difficulties facing my country, democratic transitions will not be easy. The Governments, therefore, relies on the assistance of the ILO in order to construct a more open and fair society.

My country is unable to meet its commitments. This is a blow to the incipient process of democratisation and the Government therefore appeals to the international organisations to help it to right its ship, which is threatening to sink. I plead in favour of the present Government which is the result of national consultation and which is entrusted with managing the country until the national conference which will certainly be meeting soon.

In the field of human development, Chad is a country which is at a great disadvantage. Indeed, the life expectancy at birth is 46 years of age, and the death rate among children remains very high, 180 per thousand; furthermore, only 30 per cent of the population has access to health care – 26 per cent to drinking water.

This situation is a serious handicap to economic development. Thus the Government has emphasised human resources development, which aims at improving levels of education among the population and living conditions.

Obviously, plans to improve the standard of living of the population must not do so to the detriment of international standards. The Government shares your concerns with respect to freedom of association. It has never ceased to consult its social partners on questions which are directly of concern to the life of the State. Its concern is to eliminate discrimination in all its forms in order to build a society in which each citizen will have his place.

Need we recall that we are only transients in the present process, and that we must therefore act as good managers in order to bequeath to future generations a just State which we will have to prepare for them? The challenge is a big one but the stakes are worth while.

Mr. CHOWDARY (Employers' delegate, India) – At the outset, permit me to convey the good wishes of the employers of India to this Conference, and greetings to Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues for being elected as the President of this august gathering.

Since we last met in this historic city, many significant developments have taken place around the world. Some of the widely accepted ideologies have been demolished. This has been marked by the emergence of a democratisation process which has penetrated into some of the impregnable regimented political systems. As new-born democracies are roughing up the imminent political transformations with great courage, stoicism and pragmatism, we in India, fortunate to be the largest and one of the oldest democracies in the world, are convinced that individual initiatives can find a fuller expression only in an environment of freedom.

Democracy is not merely a political system, it is a philosophy, a cultural heritage and a way of life. This has to be tended and fostered with great care. The States should be helped to pull through the pangs of change, so that fragile, new-born democracies are not crushed under pressures of uncertainties and disillusionment. Indeed, it is thoughtful of the ILO at this critical juncture, to address itself to the problems and challenges emanating from the political restructuring and readjustment.

The exalted hopes and optimism in the basic values of democracy can be sustained only through building strong democratic institutions. These institutions should stand the test of time and weather political uncertainties and turbulence. For this, the structural changes in the political system should be associated with economic reforms. Human dignity and freedom may not flower in an atmosphere stifled with unemployment, scarcity and human sufferings. The new-born democracies and the existing ones have to be insulated from economic degeneration. Let democracy take root to signal increased world trade, investment, and above all peace in the emerging global village. At this crucial juncture the role of multilateral organisations like the ILO to combine the collective efforts of the community of nations to nurture democratic institutions cannot be overemphasised. Technical and financial support should flow to the new and existing democracies, with a view to ensuring economic and political stability.

As the world around us is increasingly committed to a market-friendly approach, we in India have been dismantling our controls and fetters. Our transition to a more liberalised economy was characterised by concrete steps towards industrial delicensing, lowering of tariff bariers, partial convertibility of currency, liberal laws to attract foreign investment and the like. We have made remarkable progress on many fronts, yet we still have a long way to go. We should generate more employment and increase the purchasing power of the people and, at the same time, we have to grapple with our growing industrial crisis. As we ponder about improving productivity and the quality of Indian products to penetrate into the global market, we have to take a hard look at the various legislations, including that of industrial relations, which seem to have become outmoded. No doubt the three parners of growth – industry, labour and the Government – should come forward, leaving behind their conventional hang-ups and reservations, to work jointly for a new India, an India full of hopes, aspirations and prosperity.

We are striving towards achieving a mutually agreed upon agenda for development. We are teaching ourselves to shed our confrontational approach and to take to the path of consultation for negotiated settlement. It may well take time, and I am convinced that in our efforts to achieve higher economic growth, attain better standards of living for the common man and the social good, many sacrifices and adjustments will have to be made from all sides, including industry and labour.

This brings me to the crucial issue of the crisis in industry. No doubt it is a global phenomenon, and yet the policy parameters to deal with crises in the developed countries are essentially different from those of the developing countries. The developing countries are often faced with certain socio-economic dimensions which compromise the more logical and rational winding-up of enterprises. We are examining this issue in the tripartite forums and hope to resolve it amicably, of course, by providing a safety net for redundant workers.

The ILO could implement some concrete initiatives which regard to the rehabilitation of enterprises in difficulty, and also for abating crises in industry. The road to recovery is no doubt a hard, but a rewarding one. As an industrialist I have had the privilege of turning around a few enterprises experiencing difficulties some of them in a remarkably short time. It is a question of drawing up a viable rehabilitation package and of retraining and redeploying workers. Many managers especially in the small and medium sectors, may not be equipped to grapple with this challenging task. In this regard, in addition to state functionaries, international organisations like the ILO have an important role to play in promoting entrepreneurship, drawing up rehabilitation packages and creating institutional mechanisms to provide easy credit to employers to tide them over crises.

Multilateralism is the key word for promoting global trade. We sugest bringing more products and services into GATT negotiations to ensure equal access to all on the global market. We are referring to agricultural products, services, IPR and so on. Is it not time to consider the free movement of labour from areas where there is a surplus to regions where there is a shortage, without going through the rigours of visas, work permits, etc.? Should not labour from countries like India and Pakistan be given free access to jobs in other countries where their skills are needed? Let there be minimum restrictions on their movements across countries. This would act as an in-built mechanism for containing the cost of production, since it would prevent the emergence of super-competitive wage prockets, especially in the developed countries.

Every year we assemble here and pass resolutions on multifarious issues concerning labour and industry. It is a moot point as to how many such resolutions are ratified by the contracting nations. For a variety of reasons, these resolutions are sometimes not implementable. It could be that they are not relevant to local conditions. There could also be a lack of good will on the part of governments to push through the legislation for political reasons.

What I would venture to say is that, while passing the resolutions, we should not lose sight of their relevance and practicality. Some flexibility should be provided in the resolutions to enable the governments of the respective countries to make adjustments, in keeping with local conditions.

This session of the Conference is taking place at a time when the Rio meeting on the environment is in progress. Rio is a meeting point where experts, businessmen and governments discuss and deliberate on matters relating to substainable development. Environmental protection for posterity is crucial and, at the same time, quite costly. I only wish the Rio Conference would drawn up a consensus on the agenda for the developed and the developing world on environmental protection, the sharing of implementation costs, and other issues.

No economic development programme would be successful without social dimensions added to it. Human rights are to be protected at any cost. Discrimination in the name of sex, religion, caste, creed or colour should be vehemently opposed. Population growth in many developing countries should be checked and something seriously done about it. It should be our endeavour to work for a world where there would be no illiteracy, hunger or denial of any basic need to the individual. Emphasis should be laid on providing the best health care and shelter for everyone. At the national level, the priorities should be well laid out and for no reason whatsoever dignity of life be sacrificed for the economic or political ends of the nation.

I am grateful to you for giving me an opportunity to share my thoughts with delegates attending this session of the International Labour Conference, and I take this opportunity of wishing the Conference a thumping success.

Mr. BASNET (Workers' delegate, Nepal) – At the outset, let me express my congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the highest post of this august gathering. The other officers of the Conference also deserve my congratulations on being elected to their respective posts.

Democracy is fundamental for development. This is the notion which recognises the basic values of human beings and their importance in nation building and development. In this context, the Report of the Director-General of the International Labour Office which we have before us, has rightly illustrated that without democracy there cannot be sustained development.

The report, which focuses on the ILO and democracy, is a very timely and excellent work and I would like to congratulate the Director-General on it. Democracy gives people higher hopes and greater expectations. Lack of fulfilment may turn into frustration. The ILO should take appropriate action to improve the conditions of workers around the world before it is too late.

In Nepal, we have enacted a new Labour Law and Dispute Settlement Act. Our workers have high hopes of its full implementation.

The liberalisation policy is a worldwide phenomenon and with it governments are geared for rapid privatisation. The concerns of workers should not be ignored while privatisation is taking place. This policy should not concentrate only on the economic power of a section of society but also on social justice. In this context, we hope workers get their fair share of the development taking place in their countries. Social justice needs to be maintained appropriately.

Under our democratic policy in Nepal we believe in the greater role of harmonious industrial relations among all three partners in development. We attach great importance to each other's role in bringing about changes for the better in the downtrodden section of society. In this connection, the role of the ILO should be further strengthened through its technical assistance in Nepal.

Original – Spanish: Mr. SALAS (Workers' delegate, Bolivia) – I take the floor on this occasion, on behalf of the Central Bolivian Workers' Union the only trade union in my country which brings together workers, peasants and students, self-employed persons, employees in the public service, etc., in other words, the great majority of the Bolivian people.

The Reports which the Director-General has presented to past sessions of the International Labour Conference have always dealt with problems of great importance. This year, the subject selected speaks of the role of the ILO in the process of democratisation.

We consider it a most appropriate subject because we are living major changes throughout the world; changes which have modified the framework of relations between countries and regions of our planet, as well as social and production relations within each of our countries.

In general, we share the criteria voiced by the Director-General concerning the need for democracy as the sine qua non for development and progress. We consider democracy as a universal value in its own right, as well as the legitimate aspiration of every society, of every individual. Nevertheless, in order for democracy to be that which we think it is, it must be an integrated whole; that is, it must be political, economic, social and cultural, offering equal opportunity to all members of society with no discrimination of any kind.

In the same way democracy cannot be reduced to the mere exercise of the right to vote, granted by the authorities periodically. What we seek is the effective participation of peoples in the decision-taking process as it relates to all aspects of national life.

We are also deeply concerned that the emerging economic order will not be favourable to all countries in the same manner. It is obvious that, notwithstanding the changes, there has been no positive shift of economic and trade relations between industrialised and underdeveloped countries. The latter continue to be the object of irrational and unjust treatment on the part of major power centres and international financing agencies. It is therefore necessary to set up a new international economic order which is compatible with democratic changes and with our people's aspirations to justice and social progress.

In this framework, we consider the role to be played by the ILO in the thrust towards a just relationship between the developed countries and the so-called Third World countries of fundamental importance.

The ILO must also give sufficient attention to the problems deriving from the application of so-called structural readjustment policies in the underdeveloping countries.

To our mind, in Latin America, the appplication of these neo-liberal cast policies have worsened the conditions of poverty on which millions of people live, and each day make our countries more externally dependant.

Of all social sectors the workers are the most affected because readjustment policies are addressed first to reducing public spending or the public deficit, which means massive layoffs, the freezing or reduction of wages and the systematic elimination of social benefits, as well as the setting of new rules to govern labour management relations.

In my country the situation is very difficult because neo-liberalism has been applied without a consensus on the part of the population. We, the Bolivian workers, are convinced that living together in democracy requires the just treatment of social matters, of relations between workers and employers, be they private or public. In my country this is not as yet the case, because the appplication of neo-liberal economic policies exercises truly damaging effects on a majority of workers, indeed on the majority of the Bolivian people. The weight of the crisis and of the structural readjustment policy is borne exclusively by the shoulders of the workers. As an example, according to the figures made available to us by the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia itself, a very high percentage of active workers earn less than the national average of 308 pesos bolivianos (80 US dollars), whereas the average family requires four times as much to meet its basic needs.

The wage bill has become virtually the only variable in entrepreneurial economy. Laying off or firing workers, reducing wages is widely used to reduce costs. State institutions show the purchasing power has fallen by 17 per cent over the last six years and worst of all, wage fixing is the exclusive responsibility of the employers who, as they see fit, may or may not compensate for cost-of-living increases, as is the case at present where large sectors refuse to grant wage rises.

Furthermore, the labour situation is aggravated by the continuing increase in unemployment. In the public sector alone, some 90,000 persons have been laid off, to which we must add some 32,000-odd in the private sector. They all went to swell that mass of people who, owing to structural problems in the economy, are unemployed. It is well-known that the informal urban sector is growing apace; in 1985 they were only 482,000; in 1989 some 618,000 found themselves in that sector. The sector in a marginal one as far as productive activity is concerned.

A consequence of this is patent in an ever-increasing trend towards precarious employment. Social security statistics illustrate this: in 1985 there were 343,000 active workers and 119,000 non-active workers covered; in 1988 the number of the former fell to 142,000. This confirms the prevalence of unemployment and the growth of precarious employment.

Rates of family participation on the labour market, or in the informal sector are constantly increasing. Recent surveys show that some 53 per cent of family income in those areas where manual workers or workers from the informal sector live is represented by child labour.

Situations such as the above give rise to protest and to popular resistance, often repressed forcibly. Nevertheless, far from any solution to this critical solution, greater sacrifice is imposed on the working classes; a 30 per cent increase in taxes and the elimination of the social security system in its present form, i.e. on the princples of social solidarity and universality.

Faced with this situation the Central Bolivian Workers' Union has drawn up a series of proposals, contained in a single national platform, the purpose of which is to achieve a substantial change on the guide-lines for the allocation of resources and ensure that production increases at the national level be encouraged in the major economic activities, such as mining, petroleum and its derivatives, manufacturing, the agro-industry, building and construction, in order to prevent the further impoverishment of the population.

We also request an increase in social expenditure, particularly on education and public health. We demand the employers comply with Convention No. 98 and make collective bargaining an institutionalised process. To date legal personality is applicable only to workers' organisations and not to employers' organisation.

Lastly, we submitted to the Ministers of Labour of the Andean Area, who met in Bolivia in October 1991, an Andean Social Charter to guarantee the conquests made of the workers with much sacrifice and effort and which neo-liberal policy tries to overlook.

We feel that the best guarantee for strengthening democracy is to consolidate the effective participation of the people and their organisations in the decision-taking process and to give a practical solution to the serious social problems from which millions suffer. This requires ever greater efforts on the part of the State and a change in attitude by the employers to ensure that economic activity is the job of all, and not just an easy way out to enrich the few.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. COSTA (Employers' delegate, Brazil) – May I congratulate the President on his election to lead this session of the International Labour Conference. May I also express the great joy of all Brazilians here present at having as our President such an illustrious representative of those who left us as heritage the beautiful Portuguese language.

The great challenge for the developing countries lies in simultaneously building a democratic political system, an economic system based on the laws of the market, and social justice.

Experience has shown that uneven progress on any of these points will imperil the final objective which, in the final analysis, is sustainable development and acceptable quality of life for all.

The evidence clearly suggests that the struggle cannot be carried out exclusively in the developing countries, but that the entire world community must play a role, and that the ILO has a leading irreplaceable part to play.

The wealthy countries must realise that they will have no lasting peace whilst there are millions of persons throughout the world living in conditions which are incompatible with human dignity.

Apart from the problem of the environment – which is planetary in scope and whose solution requires the eradication of absolute misery – the intensification of migrant flows runs the risk of doing away with the dream of a world without frontiers.

A frightening thought is the growth of racism and nationalism in the developed countries. This coincides with the rebirth of totalitarian doctrines which we had thought buried at the end of the Second World War.

The recent events in Eastern Europe cannot be interpreted merely as the end of the Cold War and an automatic new era of peace and prosperity. This would be simplistic and naive. The established order cannot be modified overnight without giving rise to a hurricane of political, economic and social consequences which take on their own dynamic and whose end results can be disastrous.

The world is living through a critical moment, typical of a transitional period which can either represent the consolidisation and generalisation of the liberal values or their exhaustion, accompanied by the triumph of totalitarianism throughout the world.

If it is often said that life imitates art; we should give greater thought to science fiction, which rarely presents future societies as a democratic paradise. Rather, they present them as empires with no room for the flowering of individual freedoms.

We must give greater attention to what goes on around us, and be careful in managing our road so that this very fertile and promising period does not go down in history as a mere "liberal spring".

I have already mentioned my concern of what is going on in the Old World. Now I would touch on the major contradictions which make the adjustment problems so painful in the developing world, in Latin America and in Brazil, whose employers it is my honour to represent.

We have advanced in a dangerously uneven manner along the three fronts I mentioned earlier. This has aggravated social tension and represents a constant threat to the achievements so painfully achieved in the political context.

In Brazil, after 20 years of authoritarian government, we held free elections and directly elected and installed a civilian President. We adopted a new Constitution which re-established those basic rules of behaviour which permit the consolidation of democracy.

The citizenry recovered its civil rights. The market economy has become a constitutional principle, and workers again enjoy guarantees. Workers, employers, the executive, legislative and judiciary and the armed forces – all have well-defined spaces within which to evolve.

Brazilian trade unionism is no longer subject to the interference of the authorities and it enjoys full freedom and autonomy. We even hope to ratify Convention No. 87.

The right to strike is guaranteed under the Constitution and the workers are fully free to decide as to whether or not to go on strike. The law merely defines essential services and provides for the essential needs of the community.

We are expecting a constitutional revision in 1993 which will make our political charter more pragmatic and less populist.

Notwithstanding, our past economic stabilisation policy based on monetary austerity gave rise to a severe internal recession which was aggravated by the external recession; this had negative effects on the short – and medium – term aspect of the country's social and economic situation.

In this difficult context, the shortage of resources for investment, whether public or private aggravates the recession; in addition, it impinges on infrastructural investment to harmonise social and economic policy, and limits the capacity of entrepreneurial investment, given high levels of interest and high levels of taxes, which reflects negatively on levels of employment and on the quality of Brazilian goods and services.

Notwithstanding this uncertainty, Brazilian employers' organisations have been dynamic; after more than 40 years, they have called on the workers to set up jointly managed funds, to set up social services within industry, services and trade in order to make available to workers basic social and medical assistance. These bodies and the activities they carry out in industry, transport, fisheries, communications, commerce and tourism are the result of the employers' genuine commitment to democracy, modernity and social justice.

In the light of the social, economic and political changes of a world in crisis, we must define the ILO's role as well as its future activities.

We are convinced that technical cooperation should occupy a very important place in relation to any other activities, without prejudice to the political mission which lies beyond the ILO's area of competence.

Overcoming the present problems arising from structural adjustment requires intense international cooperation, in particular on the part of bodies such as the ILO, which seeks to reconcile economic progress and the conditions of life of all human beings and social peace.

In our opinion, this cooperation should be directed to three basic programmes: vocational training, entrepreneurial development, in particular as regards small or micro-enterprises and occupational safety and health.

Vocational professional training, in particular in developing countries represents the chance to engage in socially useful work, and it opens the road to social progress. Small and micro-enterprises are the spontaneous expression of free enterprise and create the linkage between the formal and informal sectors. Their proliferation is a factor for revitalising the social body and permits a free choice of work and employment.

Improving conditions of occupational safety and health is a corollary to the aforementioned.

Alongside technical cooperation, the promotion of tripartism is an indispensable activity. Only the dynamic and permanent exercise of tripartism can lead the State, the employers and the workers to an effective and preventive balance which will not interfere the settlement of industrial disputes. Only tripartism will permit the trade union leaders and the employers and the workers to exercise their right to collective bargaining, subject, of course, to general interests.

It is therefore indispensable to review the ILO's standard-setting activity because its effectiveness is not a function of the quantity of the instruments but rather of their quality and generalised acceptance.

We must review and revise already adopted instruments not merely to update them but to consider their appropriateness to the present situation throughout the world and in developing countries.

We further consider of great importance the role played by the ILO within the international agency family. Only the ILO can, and herein lies its major political task, sensitise the governments of the wealthier countries and the international lending agencies. To the very serious sacrifices being born by countries involved and structural adjustment processes.

Any recession has ethical and political limits when applied without counterbalancing measures, it becomes a dangerous mechanism which generates social tension and destabilises democratic institutions in developing countries. This runs counter to a balance and a consolidation of the new world order, which in theory is based on freedom, prosperity safeguarding the environment, cooperation amongst peoples, integration of markets, and greater equality.

I would like to address the question of forced labour in Brazil, an accusation made by the Latin American Central of Workers.

There is no forced labour in Brazil – it may be the case elsewhere. In Brazil, we have a trade union movement which monitors enterprises and employment effectively and in cooperation with the labour inspectorate. There may be violations of labour law, but forced labour absolutely does not exist.

In conclusion, may I again congratulate the Presidents on his election and the Director-General for the excellent work which the ILO has carried out in its spheres of competence. Once again I wish to offer the support of Brazilian employers to the achievement of peace and social justice throughout the world.

Mr. WOJCIK (Workers' delegate, Poland) – It gives me great pleasure on behalf of the Polish workers' delegation, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am proud to be a representative of the trade union that bears the name Solidarnosc. It is a reflection of an ideal we uphold as a moral imperative and it determines our attitude towards the concerns and needs of other people, in Poland and elsewhere; those living today and future generations. The sense of solidarity extends therefore to all human beings. I would like to congratulate the Director-General for his extremely appropriate choice of the theme of his Report, Democratisation and the ILO.

The Report has highlighted the question of democratisation from the comprehensive view-point of ensuring the respect for human rights, the rule of law and social justice, with due attention given to challenges facing Eastern and Central Europe in their transition to democracy and a market economy. Let me, however, formulate a few remarks on these issues.

We support the idea of the Director-General that democratisation owes a great deal to the fact that it is identified with a system of participation. We believe that the arrangements for effective tripartite consultations are a contribution to that end. There are, however, impediments which we cannot overlook. On the one hand, the development of industrial relations in Eastern and Central European countries has not yet generated a full tripartism. The still dominant state-run industry means that we still have to deal mainly with indirect, and not direct employers. To achieve a genuine tripartism we, as trade unionists, ought to support the privatisation process. The transition process creates new threats and social tensions with a steep growth of unemployment and dangerous deterioration of living standards of the entire population. In our opinion the public authorities insufficiently and too slowly address these issues.

On the other hand, the concept of tripartism requires a more dynamic interpretation of the principle of the "most representative organisations". We draw attention to this problem since in new democracies there is a trend to comprehend the term in a very narrow sense. It is often assumed that the most representative organisation is the biggest one in terms of membership, and worse, it usually is an ex-communist trade union. It is sufficient to look at the list of participants at this Conference, to see how many new democracies are represented only by ex-communist trade unions. This practice deprives our brothers and sisters from really independend and free trade unions of their representation in the ILO. Likewise, in newly emerging tripartite bodies in Eastern and Central Europe a deplorable practice is that many independent trade unions are marginalised by denial of access to these bodies and procedures. We therefore call on the Committee of Credentials and the Director-General to restore the right proportion between trade union organisations in tripartite bodies on the national plane and in the ILO itself. The ILO should be consistent in promoting pluralism and not in perpetuating the old monopolistic trade unions.

Another area of the ILO's mandate is the respect for human rights and trade union rights. We lend our support to the idea emphasised in the Report by the Director-General that all political rights and social rights are indivisible and complementary. We would like, however, to point out how dangerous it is to assume that once democracy is restored human rights are automatically observed. It is exactly the case with regard to freedom of association. In post-autocratic countries a very formal proclamation of democracy and pluralism has appeared to be insufficient. Members of the ILO are obliged therefore not only to legislate on freedom of association, but also and most importantly to demonopolise former single trade union systems by dismantling their remnants. Freedom of association may become a meaningless principle if it is not followed by the establishment of and appropriate environment for its genuine enjoyment.

The most crucial problem for the establishment of a genuinely conducive framework and opportunities for the implementation of freedom of association is a fair redistribution of trade union property and assets. It is a problem in virtually all the Eastern and Central Europe countries and in many developing countries. Regrettably however, those ex-monopolistic unions undertake deliberate and coordinated actions aiming at avoiding the redistribution of their property among all established unions. For instance in Poland the ex-communist trade unions of OPZZ resort to different tricks to avoid material responsibility by, inter alia, concealment of property and changing their legal personality. All these symptoms point to a wide-scale action taken to avoid the application of the Polish legislation on revendication of property taken over by OPZZ. Similar situations exist in other new democracies. Therefore, it is deplorable that leaders of those ex-communist unions now claim that their property is confiscated for the needs of all trade unions, as Mr. Petkov did a few days ago in his address to this Conference. It is a sort of claim that is nothing but illegal and immoral.

We would like to emphasise that the securing of our property and assets is a vital question for all the democratic and independent trade unions. It is a question of their survival, and thus of real enjoyment of freedom of association. With the lack of efficient return of our property and assets, we have been put in a discriminative situation. In this way an unjustifiably privileged position of OPZZ was created and the rule of equality of arms of all unions disturbed.

We would like, in corroboration of our claims, to refer to the standards and jurisprudence of the ILO. With respect specifically to the Polish trade unions, one should not overlook the still valid and not entirely implemented recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, which in its report of 1984 conclued in paragraph 577, inter alia, that the Government was "to study a system for the devolution of assets which would make it possible to attribute them to the true successors of the dissolved organisations".

More recently, the ILO made yet another firm step towards the protection of trade union property: In the report by the Commission of Inquiry to examine the complaint against Romania (Convention No. 111), its paragraph 616 spells out the recommendation that "the assets previously belonging to the General Federation of Trade Unions of Romania be distributed fairly among the new trade union organisations to enable them to establish themselves and to draw up the programmes called for by the current situation". We believe that due to the authority of Commissions of Inquiry, the attitude reflected in the Romanian case becomes a doctrine of the ILO in cases of devolution and distribution of trade union property and assets after periods of autocratically imposed single trade union systems. Since the ILO has demonstrated from its inception a consistent stand against the monopolistic trade union systems, it may legitimately be expected that the Organisation will continue to be no less consistent in dismantling their remnants, among which fair distribution of property and assets is of fundamental significance. Our stand on this issue has recently been supported by the resolution of the Caracas Congress of the ICFTU which claimed that the governments should take steps to remove all legal and practical impediments to fair redistribution of trade union property and assets.

For newly established, free and independent trade unions, freedom of association may become a dead letter if it is not extended by the active policy of governments in creating and contributing to the material existence and survival of workers' organisations.

There is also a need of understanding for legislative measures taken in Eastern Europe within the so-called "screening procedures". There is an unquestionable need to establish a completely new ethic of public service and this would require some examination of the fitness for employment. If such a screening is limited to persons who under the former regime committed crimes or other violations of law, it should not be found as discriminatory practice according to standards of Convention No. 111.

The trade union I represent has been for years a driving force behind the transformation process to democracy and market economy. With the greater help of the ILO, we would like to strengthen mechanisms for tripartite consultation. We find that consultation of social partners by the Government of Poland is still insufficient and we hope that the ILO will be of yet greater help in promoting effective tripartite consultations.

Mr. AFKHAMI (Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I would like to take this opportunity firstly to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I also wish to welcome the new member States to the ILO family. I am most appreciative to the Director-General for the valuable Report he has submitted to the Conference.

My speech concentrates on one of the most important subjects of this Conference, structural adjustment and human resource development, which no doubt will greatly influence the future of the developing countries. During the past few years we have faced extensive changes in various aspects of human life. The past few years have been the era of the fall of well-established ideologies and experiences. Events which were hard to predict were also hard to believe when they actually happened. Many new democracies have been born, and many suffering cultures have been freed of the shackles that confined them. It is the nature of many forms of social and economic change to create problems and suffering but in this case the outcome will benefit democracy and peace. Nations have the right to choose their own paths and to expect a minimum of problems. The authoritarian thinking behind planned economies and dictatorial society has been abandoned for the free market approach which must go hand in hand with democratic society. We now have the chance to use the world economy to help us resolve the major global issues confronting us: poverty, injustice, illiteracy, unemployment, disease, pollution, and so on. It is time that we began to wage the war against human suffering with the help of international cooperation, and the wise use of available resources, in order to create a world that we, as God's most advanced creatures, deserve. The hypothesis that a culture depends on its economy has lost its value. Now the influence of culture on future social and economic developments can be predicted. To harmonise our national economy with the world market economy, we need to take cultural aspects into consideration. The problem of the world is the problem of every society. The more developed a nation, the more responsibility it has. So in a wise world, rich societies should be more interested in international cooperation than poor ones.

It seems that in the light of recent worldwide developments, a better definition for development is called for. Maybe a combination of cultural and economic factors should be taken into consideration for a better understanding of development. To minimise the various social, economic, political and cultural losses involved in structural adjustment, we need to have a well-organised management system which is responsive enough to assess these various factors. Governments, employers and workers' organisations, together with international organisations, should play a serious and more effective role to speed up the process of transition to a market economy in as peaceful a manner as possible. In this regard, it would be advisable to consider the following points.

It is essential that governments provide the appropriate environment and infrastructure so that additional private enterprises can develop using new, productive investments which create employment. To minimise the negative impact of structural adjustment on living standards, education, employment and health, governments should concentrate on developing a support system for the poor during the transition period.

Tripartite consultation should be used extensively during the structural adjustment, and the managerial potential of employers for the successful implementation of restructuring should be highly appreciated.

Considering the high level of communications which facilitates the exchange of experiences, advanced countries should assist the developing countries to fulfil their market economy policies. To speed up restructuring, the developed countries should create an efficient and simple mechanism to grant financial and technical assistance to developing countries. Governments should eliminate existing obstacles and provide an environment conducive to international market cooperation to promote justifiable foreign investment possibilities in developing countries.

International organisations such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the International Labour Organisation should establish appropriate policies, including financial support, to ensure that development patterns meet the needs for structural adjustment and for social justice in developing countries.

It would be greatly appreciated if the international organisations, and especially the World Bank, the IMF and the ILO, joined together to bring into line their policies as regards principles of structural adjustment. Developed countries and international organisations should help developing countries provide the political and economic situations necessary for the realisation of democracy, the maintenance of living standards and employment, and finally the implementation of market economies.

In conclusion, and as an entrepreneur, I once again call for international cooperation capable of solving the complex problems the world faces. I wish all the nations of the world prosperity, happiness, progress and peace.

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. Martinez Solórzano) – Before I give the floor to Mr. De Melo, Government delegate, Brazil, for the exercise of the right of reply to a statement made by Mr. Marius, representative of the Latin American Central of Workers, I would like to recall the rules concerning the right of reply.

The reply must refer only to the point in question. It should be brief, not to exceed two minutes, and shoud in no ways give rise to further remarks. It should be worded in correct and parliamentary language. Lastly, in order to avoid prolonging the discussion, it has been a practice of Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

Original – French: Mr. DE MELO (Government delegate, Brazil) – In exercising the right of reply to which we are entitled, I would like categorically to reject the regrettable and baseless statement made by the representative of the Latin American Central of Workers concerning the existence of forced labour in Brazil.

Brazil has a well-developed and active network of trade union organisations which closely monitors the rights and guarantees of the people it represents.

Brazil also has a rigorous labour inspectorate within the Ministry of Labour, as well as an effective and developed tripartite system of labour courts.

Brazil does not tolerate forced labour. Any violation of labour legislation once denounced is immediately investigated and corrected.

This explanation is necessary so as to dissipate any doubts concerning the erroneous nature of the offhand statement made by the representative of CLAT.

(The Conference adjourned at 6 p.m.)

Ninth (special) sitting

President: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY MR. F. J. CHILUBA, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF ZAMBIA

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – It is an honour for me to open this special sitting of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I would like to invite the Secretary-General of the Conference, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to introduce His Excellency Mr. Frederick Chiluba, President of the Republic of Zambia.

Original – French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Mr. President, it is a very great honour and privilege for me to welcome you here at the International Labour Conference. I am certain that it is also a very great pleasure for many of the delegates here in this hall, and particularly for those of the Workers' group with whom you are already acquainted, to see you in Geneva once again, for you are a regular visitor to ILO meetings.

Our guest at this special sitting is a fighter for human rights and human dignity and he has taken up the cause of the workers of his country. His record as a trade unionist is exemplary, dating back to 1967 when he joined the National Union of Building Engineering and General Workers of which he became President in 1971, an office that he held until 1987. In the meantime in 1974 our guest was elected head of the Zambian Congress of Trade Unions and he remained in this post for 15 years.

Mr. F. J. Chiluba was workers' delegate of Zambia at the International Labour Conference from 1975 to 1990 and during this period he was Vice-Chairman of Conference committees a number of times.

Mr. Chiluba's activities at the international level have not prevented him from concerning himself with what was happening in his own country. Having turned down the offer extended to him to become a member of the central committee of the party in power, he went on to become an opponent of the regime. Among other measures of intimidation levelled against him, he spent some time in prison and had his passport taken away from him after he was accused of trying to form an alliance with UNITA and the South African Government in order to overthrow his own Government.

A number of senior ILO officials still remember the missions they carried out at that time to try to negotiate with the Zambian authorities.

Today President Chiluba has honoured us with his presence in his capacity as President of the Republic of Zambia, elected democratically in elections which could serve as an example to the rest of the continent. His presence here today is a unique source of inspiration and encouragement to continue to fight for the cause of human rights and for democracy.

At a time when our Organisation is striving to respond better to the needs of its constituents, his message will help to confirm the cause of social justice which we continue to pursue; he bears witness to the way that this aim can be applied at the national level.

I am sure that the delegates of the 157 member States of the ILO here today, and there have never been so many, are very keen to hear your message and so I would like to conclude by assuring you of our total support in your efforts to ensure that the rule of law prevails in Zambia. I would also like to repeat our commitment to helping you to rebuild your country on the basis of social justice, freedom and justice for all citizens.

I invite you to take the floor.

Mr. CHILUBA (President of the Republic of Zambia) – Allow me at the outset, Mr. President, to congratulate you warmly on the singular honour of being elected unanimously to the presidency of the 79th Session of this assembly. Given your well-deserved reputation for diplomacy, and the ability to foster consensus, I have no qualms about predicting success for this session.

Congratulations are also in order to the Director-General for another year of inspired and determined leadership of the ILO. This Organisation, and indeed the international community, have benefited greatly from your unique brand of statesmanship over the past year. Thank you, Mr. Hansenne, for a lifetime of dedication and service to this Organisation and to humanity.

Having addressed this body previously and experienced the exhilaration of joint deliberations and consultations with friends and colleagues from around the globe over a period spanning a decade and a half, forgive me if I admit to considering today as special. I can humbly report that it is still possible for an ordinary worker to become a Head of State. Reflecting on my move from representative and spokesman of the workers in Zambia to leader and spokesman of all its people, it is in no small measure a result of exposure, experience and skills I gained directly and indirectly from my association with this body. For that I thank you from the bottom of my heart. Your friendship and support over many years is now one of my most cherished possessions, for which I am most profoundly grateful. Your continuing, persistent drive for social justice, the development of human rights, and freedom of association now finds acute expression in my daily labours.

The agenda of this session of the Conference confirms our alignment on the urgency of finding solutions to the most pressing social dilemmas of our time. Poverty, decay in the social fabric of even the most advanced nations, and a lamentable lack of freedoms are still evident throughout the globe. May you find inspiration in your deliberations on human resources development and the protection of workers' rights. These issues become particularly relevant in the face of a global recession.

For me, as Head of State of a southern African country, the Director-General's Special Report on Apartheid in South Africa is of particular importance. My fervent hope is that the present political events in South Africa will obviate the necessity to discuss this arduous subject except as an unfortunate relic of the past at next year's session.

The fundamental purpose of the ILO, which as we all know is defined in the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, embraces so wide a range, including social justice and its contribution to lasting peace, and the rights of all peoples – regardless of race, colour, creed or sex – to pursue their spiritual development, material well-being and economic security on the basis of equal opportunity, that the limits of debate in the International Labour Conference can never be narrowly circumscribed.

The ILO has a continuing responsibility to focus attention on these objectives and on policy criteria, irrespective of political considerations. There is nevertheless an essential distinction between the purpose and proper scope of such debate in the International Labour Conference, and the discussion of political matters in such organs of the United Nations as the Security Council and the General Assembly.

In periods of acute political tension the ILO thus has a twofold responsibility. First, to uphold the cherished values of human freedom and dignity, enshrined in its Constitution; and secondly, to contain, rather than extend, the area of international tension by ensuring the fullest possible degree of cooperation in pursuit of its own objectives.

Zambia, I am proud to say, held this very position even during its own transition to multi-party democracy. Happily, the initial tentative steps towards democracy are on the verge of becoming an avalanche. I have a feeling, as I walk around the streets, as I go about my work, that in the sixties, seventies and eighties there was a period of decolonisation. I think that the nineties have brought a period of democratisation.

With an ever-increasing number of countries moving towards multi-partism, increasingly the role of government as a pillar of the tripartite edifice is being restored.

In this context I am advocating a change in attitude towards the relationship between government, employers and workers, particularly on the continent of Africa. I say this because, as a worker and leader of the working people, it seems as though trade unions in Africa have for too long been hypnotised to shout slogans about the fair distribution of wealth, while disregarding how that wealth must be produced.

The fist of fury, shaken by workers in anger at the employers and antagonistic in symbol and in essence, remains empty unless wealth is created. Common sense, rather than ideology, prescribes cooperation as the foundation of tripartism, where the objective of creating an environment of understanding is less of an ideal than a crucial necessity for progress. Workers must come to understand that tripartism is not an excuse for revolutionaries to overrun employers. After all, as President Lincoln once remarked, you cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot help the rich either by destroying the poor. This was as true then as it is now.

The antagonism between worker and employer was not decreed by any law of nature. Of course not. It was born in the unhealthy fumes and the abominable labour practices of the industrial revolution, which also parented socialism. To socialist thinkers – and I am included – the mere ascendency of socialism as successor to slavery, feudalism and capitalism was not only obvious but absolute.

Their belief in the overthrow of capitalists by the proletariat resulted in a Darwinian and survivalist situation, where the one could not live with the other. But, firm in my belief in the opposite – that the one cannot live without the other – I appeal to you today, workers of the world, to embrace coexistence and peace. If not for yourselves, then for your children.

As the only United Nations agency with a tripartite character, which to me subsumes cooperation, coordination and coexistence, the ILO is where a new era inculcating these qualities between government, workers and employers, has to begin. Reminding myself that this is the meeting point for workers, employers and governments, I can see no better platform for this message.

This is not only a plea to workers and their unions to broadly step into a new world of cooperation and coexistence, but indeed also a clarion call to action for employers.

It is ironical that the owners of capital (the party most in need of a stable investment climate – the employers) are so often the ones to create mistrust and to inspire efforts to overthrow capitalism, through an intransigent and shortsighted attitude of trying to grab everything for themselves. This "I keep that which I hold" attitude is evident in the propensity of employers to provide investment in new equipment or its upgrading, while neglecting their responsibility to invest in workers' education, fully knowing that labour can combine fruitfully with capital only through training and retraining, the litany of woe is long. Very few employers, I am afraid, give willing and voluntary attention to the social welfare of their workers, particularly in developing countries.

Distinguished employers, may I appeal to you to examine your consciences – or is the suffering of a worker, bent under the vagaries of the weather in makeshift accommodation, meaningless to you? The catalogue of workers' miseries makes arduous reading, while very little credit is generally due to employers for helping workers to cope. And yet, employers lament the antagonism of workers, little realising that they too have to change their ways. A fundamental realignment of attitudes between employers and workers is made necessary by the realisation by employers that they cannot wish workers away.

Just as there is no longer any place in the global scheme of things for communism, extremist capitalism has also had its day – it is gone. With the end of the Cold War and the demise of communism, the world is playing on a new stage with no place for Darwinian capitalism either. Against this background, we have to remould our ideas and ideals, and nobody is better placed or should be better motivated to create the facilities and enabling environments conducive to worker/employer cooperation than governments. I say better motivated because, as greater cooperation raises economic efficiency and living standards, the popularity of government will increase.

How sad then, when, as so often happens, workers discover to their chagrin, the collusion between employers and governments. Governments must note that once caught in fraternity with employers, their ability to play independent empire will forever be compromised and their credibility tarnished.

These principles ring true for everyone, but perhaps, as a result of recent experience, especially for us in Africa. A sad example – the ruination brought about by over-indulgence in flights of fancy and the famine of commonsense – is my own country, Zambia. Bequeathed a healthy economy and sound financial base at independence in 1964, Zambia should have been a showcase today, rather than the basket case it was up to November last year, when democracy at last returned after two decades.

The movement for multi-party democracy won a resounding victory last October, but after a long but blessedly peaceful campaign for a return to democracy, the thrill of democracy, the thrill of victory was soon replaced by an ominous realisation that the country was not only run-down and ravaged by mismanagement, but indeed that the treasury was bare.

Ominous and exceedingly dark as we found our position, my Government and I, grimly determined for our people to survive, still decided that we had no choice but to liberalise the economy, reduce government involvement in commerce and industry, remove subsidies, down-size the civil service and broaden the tax base; harsh medicine indeed, and distasteful, but we swallowed it and we are swallowing it.

Now we are scratching the soil with empty hands, finding succour only in our undiminished belief that we are doing the right thing and that this will bear fruit for us. Sweet will be the fruit borne of justice, freedom and human dignity, for we have tasted the vile, bitter fruits of lies and deception fed us by dictators.

In our darkest hour, we now turn to you. Not to beg for the last crumbs on your table, but to request the tools to do the job. Poor but proud, a pride not born of ignorance, but founded upon the knowledge that we are taking the difficult road and suffering the pain of convulsions, not terminal illness.

In these circumstances, my Government finds itself in extreme difficulty in its struggle to develop the enabling environment in which progress, stability and peace can be built. We have the will, we have proven our determination to wrestle with the most difficult problems, untiringly, until victory. We do not have the tools, unfortunately. All our good intentions will be painfully ground to dust unless we receive help urgently, and it is this that I ask. We do not expect aid as a right. Our plea is for you to recognise both our plight and our promise. The Zambia of today is committed, but we need your help to realise the promise and get back to where we can help ourselves.

The ILO – cradle of ideals which triumphed in Zambia – is where we turn now for the tools to build a society unknown in Zambia for three decades. We used the ILO blueprints (if I may boast); now help us to build a working, living, breathing monument to justice, freedom and dignity, and let us share the excitement, the glory and the peaceful contentment that there is hope for Africa after all. You will prove so in Zambia, if you help us.

I am thus optimistic that, despite our problems, workers, employers and governments can enter a new era of tripartism, where cooperation, coordination and coexistence will be the norm. An era where cooperation will bring justice and antagonism will fade; where coordination will create wealth and conflicts subside; and where coexistence will bring peace even to adversaries locked in battle today.

Mr. President, distinguished ministers, excellencies, my lifelong friends here seated: I greet you, finally, not as a Head of State at all, but as a fellow worker, labouring for the benefit of all in Zambia and, I am sure, in the world at large.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I believe that I can speak on behalf of all of the delegates present at this Session of the Conference when I extend our vote of thanks to President Chiluba for the very profound message that he has just given us.

It has been a great honour to hear you, Mr. Chiluba, and also a great lesson to listen to your message. It was a lesson because of its content, a message which will stay with us long after we have left this hall. It was a lesson because of the remarkable significance of your personality.

In many ways you are a symbol. First of all, a symbol of freedom itself. Those who in flesh and blood, and even in their souls, have suffered the ignomy of prison and political persecution simply because they wished for their people basic political freedom have a very special moral authority when they state that without democratic freedom a people cannot be sovereign. It is a moral authority which acquires even greater legitimacy because the sovereign will of the people of Zambia led you, in 1991, through free elections, to the presidency of your country.

Secondly, you are a symbol of the struggle for social justice. As President of the Trade Union Congress of Zambia since 1974, your permanent and unswerving dedication to the trade union movement confers on you the very well-earned status of trade union leader emeritus, and a fighter for basic social rights which dignify workers.

Thirdly, you are a symbol of participatory democracy because you are expert in the exercise of dialogue, through which man seeks to achieve understanding and forge a consensus that will lead to peaceful solutions. As a workers' delegate of Zambia to the sessions of this Conference from 1975 to 1990 without interruption, and chosen by the Workers' group to lead several important committees, you have acquired extraordinary experience and made an immeasurable contribution to tripartism, all of which is a very solid guarantee of your loyalty and dedication to the broadest values of social dialogue.

And so you are in fact a symbol of the victory of democracy in the political, economic and social fields and a living example of the universality of democracy.

Your message resounds as a symbol of the voice of the peoples of the African continent. Victims of decadent and falling dictatorial regimes, devastated by natural catastrophes, suffering from famine and endemic disease, the poor and the suffering of Africa find in you a trustworthy defender. And for this reason, too, you are a guarantee of the urgently needed support for the poorest, and for the transparent and rational distribution of available resources.

Today the ideological logic, which was in the past so often merely a cover for oppression, has now been broken. The time has come for the logic of mutual assistance and loyal cooperation to triumph on the basis of a common understanding that peace among all will be achievable only through economic progress and social justice in a permanent battle against poverty wherever it exists.

All this means that we need a renewed vision, a multidisciplinary and global vision, of development. It means that we need a far closer and more fruitful cooperation between the different international organisations, each in their own specific field, to develop education, health, communications, financial rectitude, the economic restructuring of our societies as well as social justice. And therefore we need to find that interrelationship between these organisations so that human rights can reach their full dimensions. Fate has decided that the President elected for this session of the Conference should be a European, a citizen of Western Europe, of a country with over eight centuries of history, Portugal. But our roots go back to a beautiful and great brother country in Africa, Angola. I have a clear memory of the teachings of the old traditions of the peoples of Africa and in particular of the age-old practice of the village elders who gather the people of their village around them to listen to their complaints, to mediate in their disputes, to bring justice to the persecuted, to punish the guilty and to bring peace to their communities.

Allow me to express the sincerest wish that you, Your Excellency, who are young, a politician in the prime of life, an African of great international prestige, will always hold dear to you that calm, deep wisdom of the elders of Africa. May that wisdom always guide you on the straight and narrow path of peace.

The meeting is adjourned.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – The first item on our agenda is the fourth report of the Selection Committee which is contained in Provisional Record No. 6C.

The report contains only changes to the composition of the committees and it is presented to you for adoption. If there are no objections I shall consider that it has been adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD) – We will now continue our debate on the reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Mr. ATASAYAR (Employers' delegate, Turkey) – I have great pleasure in extending to the President on behalf of the delegation of Turkish employers and on my own behalf, sincere congratulations on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference.

It is with great interest that I have read the Director-General's Report and I would like to thank him for having provided us with a lot of food for thought, with a text which can easily be included in the reading list of any social sciences faculty anywhere in the world.

Having said this, I must make it very clear at the outset that Mr. Hansenne's Report is far from being a purely academic work and, in fact, contains many practical views and recommendations which should be thoroughly examined, discussed and put into operation by the ILO and its constituencies.

Nothing is more comforting to see than the situation today where by towards the end of this century, which has witnessed more bloodshed than any other century in the history of mankind, democracy has ultimately become the universal value and watchword of the world. We owe this development to the collapse of the so-called "socialist" regimes. But democracy has also played a decisive role, by proving to be the only regime in which all segments of a society can freely pursue and promote their interests. Therefore, if we sincerely want it to reign in this world from now on, we must all support the efforts of the countries that are currently going through the process of democratisation. In this connection, the Director-General's Report has created a genuine opportunity to discuss this problem at length in this truly international forum. As Turkish employers, we particularly appreciate and support both the Turkish Government's and the ILO's efforts to search for ways and means to contribute to the smooth operation of the process of democratisation.

Democracy, economic development and social progress are inseparable from each other and in a way they can be likened to the three sides of a magic triangle. If you try to achieve only one or two of them by neglecting the other, you can never complete that magic triangle.

In our opinion, it is wrong to conceive democratisation only as a political phenomenon. In fact, social rights cannot be enhanced without promoting economic development. Similarly, economic stabilisation is a prerequisite for lasting democracy. Developing countries abound in examples of this interdependence.

Therefore, I would like to point out that the first step to be taken to promote democratisation is to base it on a sound economic structure which is also the precondition for social progress. Here, we face a fundamental choice between the widening or deepening of social rights in a country. We are convinced that, in this respect, widening should be preferred to deepening. We believe that this view is also valid for Turkey.

In response to the Director-General's views expressed in his Report to this Session, I would like to make the following points in the light of Turkey's experiences.

We believe that all international organisations, including the ILO, should take a firm stance against terrorist acts threatening democracies today. International terrorism can only be dealt with through international cooperation and solidarity.

The ILO should provide all the necessary assistance to countries that have already embarked upon policies conducive to market economies. Symposiums and other international gatherings similar to the one which was recently held in Brussels should also be organised for the new independent States of Asia. I take particular pleasure in expressing our preparedness to support such initiatives.

In support of the Director-General's views, I would like to emphasise that tripartism is perhaps the best way through which democratisation can be promoted. However, to achieve this end, we need genuine adherence to practices of tripartism. Tripartism should not remain as a "facade" only. Obviously, this will require a considerable amount of goodwill and mutual trust on the part of the parties concerned. Efforts by governments to impose one-sided policies based on their political views on the problems and issues of working life can only be counter-productive. This kind of attitude will weaken and even damage the operation of tripartism in solving those problems.

I am pleased to inform you that in Turkey we have all the institutions of tripartism. However, it is hard to claim that we make efficient use of them in the face of the problems besetting our working life. We sincerely believe that for a well-functioning tripartite mechanism to exist, the parties thereto should pay more attention to its substance than to its appearance. This in turn, means that their views should be thoroughly assessed and taken into consideration when tackling the problems. We maintain that with certain classical, and to a large extent, outmoded approaches, it is virtually impossible to face today's economic and social realities.

To conclude, we would like to reiterate, as representatives of Turkish employers, our preparedness to support fully the ILO's efforts in contributing to democratisation through enhancing respect for fundamental human rights, promoting employment for healthier economic structures and developing tripartism among employers' organisations, trade unions and the State. Problems created by democracy can be solved by the principles of democracy. It will make us very happy to see the ILO adding this to its basic principles.

Original – Hungarian: Mr. KISS (Minister of Labour, Hungary) – First of all, permit me to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I am quite certain that our Conference will complete its mission and will successfully carry out all the tasks before it.

On behalf of the Hungarian Government, I would like to express my appreciation for the effective and pioneering work of the International Labour Office. I would also like to convey our Government's gratitude to the Director-General for the preparation of his Report, which addresses issues of high importance to us, and to thank him for the generally high standard of the documents prepared for the Conference.

For us, the theme and issues discussed in the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO, are vitally important. Its message that the political climate in all regions of the world shows signs of democratisation is very encouraging. It brings us to realise that we can build democracy in Hungary as part of a global process, with the contribution of other countries and the International Labour Organisation. At the same time, the Report warns us that democratic changes and market liberalisation often incur enormous social costs: inflation and unemployment. On the basis of our example I can safely say that under these conditions the responsibilities and tasks of labour administration are excessively difficult. Its success – which is quite obviously influenced by various factors – can be viewed by measuring the amount of social justice, social security and, finally, democracy prevailing in both society and the conscience of the people.

As for the Republic of Hungary, halfway through its mandate the first freely elected democratic Government has made progress of historical proportions in the development of a new society. Our fundamental institutions are solid, and the transformation of the economy and the development of the market are, according to statistics and in actual fact, taking place at an appropriate rate. However, the consequences of the inherited difficulties, the world economic recession and the regional crisis in central and eastern Europe are to a large extent increasing the social burdens of economic transformation.

The best way to alleviate these burdens is the establishment of an effective economic policy, which also simultaneously calls for an effective social policy. The fundamental issue is the creation of new jobs to replace those that gradually are disappearing. Nevertheless, our confidence in the healing process of an ill economy cannot preclude treating the painful symptoms still besetting it as it recovers. To make these burdens more bearable the labour administration cannot neglect its power to influence the complex consequences for employment of structural transformation. Unemployment is increasing, and it currently stands between 9 and 10 per cent. However, this is still manageable for our society and despite further increases in unemployment I believe that we will be able to handle the situation. In order to achieve this goal, our main responsibility is to enforce an active employment policy with continuous employment and to encourage effective employment promotion. Therefore, in the coming years, we will place special emphasis on quickly providing timely and useful information for people taking part in the labour market, in the exchange of labour, in career counselling, support for entrepreneurs and training and retraining programmes.

I would like to emphasise that the Hungarian Government also supports the realisation of the labour market system and its institutions by means of legislation. In our legislature, we pay considerable attention to the principle of tripartism, which we regard as the guarantee of economic transformation. We believe that the tripartite system is an essential element of political democracy and the market economy, since only a dialogue between the social partners can ensure a supportive social consensus, which is necessary to achieve the objectives of economic policy. In this spirit, we wish to enable both the employers' and workers' organisations to play a more significant role in finding solutions to labour problems. Our Employment Promotion Act of 1991 has been further developed with this aim in mind. It corresponds to European labour standards, and enhances active means to prevent and reduce unemployment while protecting the living conditions of the unemployed. With respect to the increasing demands of economic transformation, the Act, which enforces the principle of social justice more consistently, defines the rights and responsibilities of the social partners – employers and workers, the State and the minicipalities – and encourages them to establish new forms of cooperation.

The Labour Code approved by Parliament this year introduces a new relationship between the tripartite system and the world of work. Amongst the multitude of labour issues it deals with, the Labour Code aims to establish a new market-oriented regulation of cooperation between employers and workers. The basic principle of the regulation is the retreat of the State from the world of labour. This does not, however, mean a complete withdrawal. The regulatory function of the State is clear in two areas: on the one hand, in guaranteeing to a certain extent the employment of workers; on the other hand, in ensuring their collective action in a normative way. Thus, legal provisions concerning workers are confined to the establishment of norms and minimal standards.

The new Labour Code also establishes an institutional system for the reconciliation of labour interests. Workers are eligible to participate in the management of the company in the form of a workshop council. The trade unions, for their part, play a major role in negotiations concerning social matters, reconciliation of interests and collective agreements. So far as institutions are concerned, we have thus separated the reconciliation of interests from participation in management, following the model employed in most developed market economies. It is of no surprise that the introduction of workshop councils brought about some bitter disputes, as many people considered their establishment an attack against the trade unions.

I strongly believe that this is not the case. We need effective protection of the workers' interests. This requires the protection of the interests of trade unions and also the protection of the workshop councils, each of which represents a given group of workers.

I would like to emphasise two points regarding the relationship between Hungary and the International Labour Office. First, Hungary will uphold and strengthen its commitment to respect and apply the international labour standards in every way possible to help attain the noble objectives and ideals of the ILO. I would also like to stress our very great appreciation for the contributions made by the International Labour Office to solving our domestic labour problems, and first and foremost the technical and professional assistance that we have received in the framework of ILO projects. The invaluable support of the International Labour Organisation will greatly assist the Hungarian Government in finding solutions which are acceptable for our society in the areas of structural transformation and consistent changes in ownership. To a certain extent, we regard the International Labour Office's intention to establish in our capital a central and eastern European multi-disciplinary ILO team as an acknowledgement of our efforts so far. I am quite certain that this step, which is highly appreciated by both my Government and me personally, will greatly contribute not only to the Hungarian transformation but to the other democratic processes in central and eastern Europe as well.

Mr. CASTILLO (Government delegate, Belize) – I am indeed honoured and it gives me great pleasure on behalf of the Government and people of Belize to be afforded the privilege of addressing this august assembly.

May I join the many other speakers in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them all success with their deliberations.

Permit me also to congratulate the Director-General of the International Labour Office for his excellent Report which we have read very carefully. The theme of the ILO and the process of democratisation is a timely one and Belize fully supports all the ILO's efforts to achieve lasting peace and happiness for all through the democratic process.

Before addressing myself to the Director-General's Report, permit me once again to express my sincere thanks and gratitude to the International Labour Organisation, its Regional Office and also the Caribbean Labour Administration Centre for their continued assistance to Belize, particularly in the areas of advice and training. We look forward to their continued support in the future.

The protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer is of great importance at this time because of the rapidly changing economic situation world-wide. Bankruptcies, although undesirable, are a frequent phenomenon and workers should not be deprived of their wages because of this unfortunate situation. There is the risk every day of workers not only losing their jobs but also their pay for work already performed. The protection of workers' claims affected by bankruptcy is an essential question since their salary is the only income upon which workers can depend for their livelihood. Workers should not have to suffer because employers choose to settle their other debts before meeting their claims. It is therefore necessary for the ILO to prepare a new instrument which will offer better protection for workers' claims threatened by non-payment because of the adverse financial position of their employers. In other words, employees are preferential creditors of failed enterprises.

The following has been accomplished by the Government of Belize over the past year:

1. The Labour Code of Conduct was reprinted and updated.
2. A minimum wage for manual workers was established. It is $2.00 per hour for manual workers engaged in agriculture, agro-based industries or export-oriented industries, and $2.25 for manual workers engaged in other industries. The reason for this is to allow for expansion and competitiveness on the international market. In areas where the hourly rate may not be applicable or effective, piece or task rates are to be used. These must be determined mutually between the employer and the employee. It is only in the event that there is disagreement between the two with respect to what is considered a reasonable piece or task rate that the Labour Department will intervene to resolve the issue.
3. The discussions of the proposed amendments to the Labour Act have recently been completed by the Labour Advisory Board.
4. In order to continue to improve the lot of the working class I have recently appointed a wages council to examine the wages paid to shop assistants and domestic helpers with a view to increasing their minimum wages.

Before concluding, I should like to mention some very important events which occurred during the latter part of 1991 and early this year. These were as follows:

1. Belize participated as a full member at the 21st Regular Session of the General Assembly of the Organisation of American States which was held in Santiago, Chile, during the week 3-7 June 1991.
2. Belize's Ambassador to the United Nations represented Belize at the 10th Conference of the Non-aligned Movement held in Accra, Ghana, 2-7 September 1991. He delivered an address on behalf of Belize.

3. Guatemala and Belize established full diplomatic relations on Wednesday, 11 September 1991. Guatemala immediately named its Ambassador to Belize. This dramatic event occurred exactly six days after the President of Guatemala announced the recognition of Belize as an independent state.
4. Belize's Ambassador to the United Nations was elected to serve as a Vice-President of the United Nations General Assembly during its sessions which opened on Tuesday, 17 September 1991. It is the first time since its admission ten years ago that Belize has held a Vice-Presidential seat in the United Nations General Assembly. On 8 October 1991 Belize's Ambassador addressed the 46th Session of the United Nations in New York. He took the opportunity to apprise the world community of Belize's position on issues of international concern, and also brought the United Nations up to date on recent developments in Belize, foremost of which was the outcome of the negotiations between Belize and Guatemala.
5. Belize participated for the first time in the 4th Conference of Labour Ministers from Central America and Panama held in Guatemala City on 9 and 10 September 1991. Initially we were invited to participate as observers, but upon our arrival there we were accorded full membership status in this regional organisation.
6. I also attended the 5th Meeting of Ministers of Labour of Central America and the Dominican Republic held in Panama from 9 to 11 April 1992, and a symposium on Employment in the Public Service in Costa Rica from 23 to 24 April 1992.

In conclusion, I would like to assure you of my Government's fullest support for the efforts of the International Labour Organisation to contribute to a better working environment, safe and equally secure for the social and financial well-being of all mankind. It is our sincere desire that the deliberations of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference should be successful.

Mr. BUNNAG (Minister of Labour, Thailand) – On behalf of the delegation of the Government of Thailand, and on my own behalf, I would like to extend greetings to fellow delegates and others attending this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. As in previous years, we appreciate this opportunity offered by the ILO of meeting and exchanging views with delegates from all over the world.

May I start by congratulating Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of the Conference. I am confident that under his able and dynamic leadership the Conference will make significant contributions to the attainment of the ILO's sacred principles of social justice and human welfare, which have always been upheld by the Royal Government of Thailand. I would also like to congratulate the distinguished representatives who have been elected to their respective positions.

The Director-General as usual has presented us with an excellent Report, which not only covers the activities of the Office but also provides future guidelines for promoting equitable socio-economic development. Thailand, as a founding Member of the ILO, has always adhered to the principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution, the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Conventions and Recommendations adopted subsequently.

Very recently we had the privilege of hosting the ILO Asian Regional Conference in Bangkok, which was attended by all the Asian regional member States, the Director-General and officials of the ILO. We benefited substantially from the deliberations of the Asian Regional Conference, which encompassed such current issues as structural adjustment and workers' safety and health. Free and frank opinions were exchanged and delegates were able to gain first-hand knowledge of the economic growth and social progress achieved by Thailand in recent years. We thank the delegates who appreciated our organisational arrangements and hospitality, and for their interest in our efforts to promote the private sector and in our real concern for workers' welfare and social justice.

For the last several years Thailand's economy has been growing at near double-digit rate. Although the growth rate slowed down slightly in 1991 it is still quite high. The success of our macro-economic policies is also reflected in the maintenance of relative price stability in the past two years. The minimal increase in price levels, combined with the high rate of growth of the GDP, has made it possible to lower the rate of unemployment and raise the standard of living of workers through effective administration of minimum wages and new regulations on occupational safety and health.

The Director-General, while referring in his Report to the need for upholding democratic principles, rightly emphasises that tripartite consultation is a democratic practice. We, in Thailand, are promoting social partnerships with the cooperation of employers' and workers' organisations, as well as the active participation of the Government, for the resolution of industrial disputes through tripartite consultations. The recent government policy announcement in Parliament affirms that both the Tripartite Wage Committee and the National Advisory Council on Labour Development will be strengthened for the protection of our workers. Implementation of labour laws, including those on minimum wages and workers' safety, has also improved substantially and labour law violations reported in 1991 were much less compared to earlier years.

In this context, I would like to refer to the problems faced by developing economies in securing the participation of employers' and workers' organisations in appropriate training programmes. The Director-General's Report mentions that training institutions are often geared to a captive formal economy market, but must also adapt their programmes to meeting the skills training needs of the informal sector. Thailand has initiated "Improve your business training" for self-employed workers in target areas. To boost the informal sector we have undertaken several measures, such as encouraging formal sector workers and employers' organisations to come into contact with their counterparts in the informal sector through subcontracting programmes. Small and cottage enterprises in urban and rural areas are being supported by large enterprises in their mutual interest. This is more evident in the agro-processing, garments, jewellery, tourism and other labour-intensive industries. Training is also being provided to the self-employed in rural areas, and technicians in the armed forces.

A recent development in Thailand is the creation of two separate departments, namely the Department of Skill Development and the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare. In the area of skills development, the needs range from common farming skills to technical skills for advanced technology. Employment promotion activities are being undertaken to enhance access to information on the demand for certain skills and training facilities to individuals, particularly the socially disadvantaged. In this context I refer to the report on adjustment and human resources development – agenda item VI – which states that there is a clear need for international technical support in education and training. Although the ultimate responsibility rests with each country, we hear of reorganisation of the ILO field structure and its role in technical cooperation activities.

I would like to reiterate that Thailand values the role played so far in rendering technical assistance by the ILO's regional centres and the Regional Department for Asia and the Pacific, particularly by ARPLA, APSDEP and ARTEP. We believe that these institutions have acquired the expertise and insights into regional situations which are difficult to substitute. I very much hope that the technical capability to provide assistance to countries in the Asian and Pacific Region will be strengthened in future.

Technical cooperation support will also be required by the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare, especially in the field of occupational safety and health. Prevention of industrial disasters is an area where such technical assistance is much needed. Our experience in implementing the ILO-aided project on major hazard control reveals that there is a global shortage of expertise in this area.

With the assistance of ARPLA and other regional centres we have trained a limited number of persons in safety procedures, including major hazard control. The needs, however, are much greater than the attention it has so far received. Without developing the expertise, the draft Conventions and Recommendations under discussion (agenda item V), will have only academic value.

As regards the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer (agenda item IV), we would like to mention that the insolvency-related problem in Thailand is within manageable limits. The number of business failures is not yet significant and, in many cases, workers' claims have been settled amicably by using the existing channels of redress, including the conciliation mechanism.

Among the agenda items before the Conference, the item on adjustment and human resource development is of great significance to Thailand. The Report on the subject, prepared by the Office, is quite informative. However, inadequate attention is paid to the situation in developing countries. In a small section, it reviews creation responses in developing countries, mainly the experience of Africa – but no coverage is given to the Asian and Pacific Region.

In Asia there are a number of countries with a high economic growth rate, as well as a high incidence of absolute poverty. There are several success stories in the region, notably those of Singapore, Japan and the Republic of Korea.

In Thailand also, the education and training process is under constant review and innovations have taken place in the formal and informal channels of education.

In developing economies, such as Thailand's, efforts are devoted to developing and upgrading the technical skills of workers, as well as supervisory and managerial talents. We feel the ILO should help develop the technological competence of its members at all three levels – workers, supervisors and managers. This approach will also help to strengthen and popularise the role of tripartite institutions.

Therefore, while the Report is useful, we would greatly benefit from a more intensive review of the situation in the Asian region.

I would like to conclude by assuring the Director-General of our wholehearted cooperation in supporting the principles and policies of the ILO.

Once again, I thank you and the delegates for your patient hearing and wish you every success in achieving the objectives of the Conference.

Mr. IJAZ-UL-HAQ (Government delegate, Pakistan) – In the name of Allah, most compassionate, most merciful!

At the very outset, I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the high office of President of this august assembly. I bring warm greeting from the people and the Government of Pakistan to him and to the distinguished delegates attending the Conference. I am confident that, under his sagacious leadership, the deliberations of this Conference will be a greater success.

The International Labour Organisation is two years away from completing three-quarters of a century of existence. I would like to go back into history and highlight the international labour standards enumerated by the holy Prophet of Islam – peace be upon him! In one case he showed it through personal example. When trenches were being dug to protect the holy city from outside invasion, he joined others in the digging work. It was not because there was a shortage of workers and an additional hand was required. He joined the workers as head of the Government to establish the dignity of labour. He showed that there was no dishonour in work. Similarly, he laid down one of the finest international labour standards by stating that a worker should be paid his dues before his sweat dries on his brow. The implied meaning indicated the mutual rights of workers and employers.

On behalf of my Government, may I commend the efforts put in by the Director-General in preparing a comprehensive Report which focuses upon the process of democratisation in member States, and the role of the ILO in this process. The Director-General has rightly pointed out that democracy is an "instrument of freedom", as well as a "symbol of the aspirations of humanity and repository of its hopes for a better life". His analysis of the current trends towards democracy and the assertions of civil liberties successfully bring home the message that observance of basic human rights is the key to world peace. It is heartening to note that the ILO has inspired the international struggle to uphold the values of human freedom and dignity and to advance social justice.

Pakistan is one of the several countries in Asia where rapid economic and political changes are taking place. The transition, though difficult, promises a more prosperous and just society. We are determined to further the democratisation process, together with social justice. We are fully aware of the need to establish a genuine connection between democracy and development.

It has been rightly pointed out by the Director-General that political constraints reduce the chances of economic success, and every collapse of the economy leads sooner or later to political upheavals. We fully concur with the view that the fate of the democratic system is closely linked with economic development and that "genuine political democracy has little chance to survive without social justice".

In order to provide support to the democratic system and to achieve economic freedom, the Government of Pakistan has introduced far-reaching reforms, including deregulation and privatisation, which aim at full utilisation of the potential of the private sector to accelerate economic growth and to provide basic services to the deprived segments of the population.

Pakistan recognises and appreciates the ILO's valuable contribution in promoting respect for fundamental human rights, freedom of association, tripartism, freedom of vocation, equality of opportunity and treatment, the right to work and right to adequate conditions of work. We share the views of the Director-General that progress towards the realisation of human rights requires changes in social relationships and conciliation of conflicting interests.

Pakistan shares the perceptions of the ILO in almost all areas of its activities. We have ratified and are adhering to the fundamental ILO standards. We do not claim perfection, yet we fully subscribe to the philosophy inherent in these instruments and are making sincere efforts to implement them in letter and spirit.

In pursuance of the United Nations' Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Pakistan Government has enacted legislation to prohibit the employment of children in hazardous occupations and processes injurious for their health and safety. The Act regulates the conditions of work of workers between the ages of 14 and 18. Violation of the Act is punishable with imprisonment of up to one year or fine of up to Rs. 20,000, or both.

Another major step taken by the Government for the protection of basic human rights is the abolition of the bonded labour system. Under the law, bonded labour has been made a cognisable offence punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to five years or a fine of not less than 50,000 rupees, or both. The law provides for the setting up of vigilance committees to monitor its implementation.

In the process of privatisation of state-owned enterprises, the Government has ensured full protection of the rights of workers. The package of measures offered to employees includes the payment of five months' wages for each year of service as a golden handshake to those opting for it. Workers rendered unemployed involuntarily are entitled to receive reasonable unemployment allowance for a maximum period of two years. In addition, 10 per cent of shares of the enterprises have been reserved for the workers.

A number of harsh realities of the present-day world remind us that we are still far from achieving the cherished goals of freedom, justice and peace, which require the recognition of the inherent dignity, and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family. Despite the enhanced stress on human rights in international relations, instances of gross violations of human rights continue to occur in various parts of the world and threaten the livelihood of working populations.

The denial of the right of self-determination of the people, as recognised repeatedly by United Nations resolutions, is a glaring example of such harsh realities and has led to violence, paralysed normal civic life and increased the sufferings of the workers in Indian-occupied Jammu and Kashmir. Thousands of innocent workers have been arrested on false charges. Hundreds of thousands of workers have become jobless. In order to conceal the havoc that it has played with the working class in Kashmir, the Indian Government has persistently refused permission to international groups to enter the occupied territory and to see the agony of an honest and diligent working population.

The plight of Kashmiri workers in this disputed territory poses a challenge to the international community. We call upon the Government of India, through this Conference, to restore normalcy in occupied Kasmir by accepting the just demands of the Kashmiri people, in accordance with United Nations resolutions. This would help the Kashmiri workers to contribute to the progress and well-being of their people.

The people of Afghanistan have finally assumed control over their destiny. We sincerely hope that the restoration of peace and stability to that war-torn country will enable all Afghans in Pakistan and in the Islamic Republic of Iran to return now to their homeland and to enjoy the dignity and honour and safety to which they are legitimately entitled after their long struggle.

Pakistan hails the recent success of the brave people of South Africa. My country has consistently supported the heroic struggle of the people of South Africa for freedom, equality and justice. We hope that the overwhelming reform vote in the 17 March referendum, will encourage President F.W. de Klerk to take the necessary steps for the complete eradication of apartheid and the introduction of genuine multi-racial democracy.

In conclusion, I would like to convey the Government of Pakistan's appreciation for the ILO's efforts to help workers throughout the globe. We hope that the ILO, in keeping with the Director-General's Report, will lend more attention to the improvement of working conditions around the world, and particuarly in those regions and areas where we still see persistent denials of fundamental human rights, including above all the very right of self-determination.

Original – Arabic: Mr. BOZO (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues, in the name of the Syrian Arab delegation and also in my own name, on the confidence that has been placed in him by this Conference in electing him as the President of this session, which is a particularly important one, given the subjects on its agenda. We are hopeful that our discussions will culminate in constructive results that consecrate the principles of the International Labour Organisation and go towards achieving its noble objectives.

I take this opportunity to thank Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, and all the officials of the ILO for their work, activities and efforts in 1991 as described in the Report before the Conference. These activities were spread over a number of countries and covered important programmes concerning international labour standards and human rights, freedom of association, the equality of rights, labour law information, international migration, vocational training, industrial relations, labour administration, the working environment, as well as sectoral and regional activities.

We hope that the need to strengthen and extend this programme in order to meet the requirements of the social partners, in particular of the Arab countries, will be taken into consideration by granting them a larger share of financing. We are pleased to say that we are now implementing a safety and health at work programme within the framework of technical cooperation with the ILO.

We would like to mention the supplementary measures, described in the Director-General's Report under the heading "Equality of rights", taken in order to carry out technical cooperation programmes in the occupied arab territories, and also the new report that has been prepared on the situation of workers in those territories on the basis of the conclusions reached by missions to those areas.

The first Part of the Director-General's Report entitled Democratisation and the ILO is admirable for it deals with a subject that affects the whole world.

This study shows that defending and strengthening freedom and equality are two of the aims of democracy, and that democracy also embraces, a form of power involving institutions, political parties, the free press, parliaments, etc., as well as the principle of recognising the oppositions rights. The democratisation process always goes hand in hand with a new economic regime or at the very least a definite change of the State's role in this area.

This study also shows that the international political climate has changed radically, and that certain countries which have moved towards democratisation are now threatened by the fact that their peoples, who have just begun to enjoy political freedom, now feel that they are suffering more misery than ever before. They realise that they have only gained the outward signs of democracy. In addition, racial tensions and conflicts have surfaced once again with a vengeance and are now taking their place in ideological conflicts.

The Report goes on to outline the areas in which the ILO can be of assistance such as in the field of human rights, in particular in the world of work, in strengthening the tripartite system and in collective bargaining.

We congratulate the Director-General on the information and the democratisation projects contained in his Report and on the ways in which the ILO can contribute to their success. In this connection we would like to refer to the huge importance that the Syrian Arab Republic gives to democracy, as reflected in the following passages quoted from a speech by Mr. Hafez al-Assad, President of the Syrian Arab Republic: "The formula for democracy is not a commodity which can be imported from one country or another, but a framework within which citizens exercise their rights and fulfil their obligations in accordance with their situation" ... "For a people to lead a democratic life, it is imperative to strike an extremely clear balance between the formula, or the structure and laws, and all of the people's cultural, historical, political, economic and social traits. Any imbalance engenders a loss of democracy" ... "Alongside democratically elected official institutions, the community councils and people's councils, there are also people's institutions, the nucleus and hierarchies of which are democratically elected; there are trade unions, with democratically elected leaderships and cores; there are political parties, with their democratically elected leaderships. Everyone takes part in the political process, shares power and participates in taking decisions: workers, peasants, teachers, students, women, merchants, doctors, engineers, and lawyers each participate in the functioning of the State and of society, in the framework of trade union organisation." ... "Democracy does not mean political anarchy, rather the creation of better conditions, allowing citizens to exercise free choice, even of the representatives they elect."

The Syrian Arab Republic is trying to develop fully in all economic, social and cultural spheres, with a view to providing a better life for its people, based on rules enshrined in the Constitution, out of which stipulates that: "it is every citizen's right to work, and his duty. The State guarantees equality of opportunity for all citizens, and guarantees women every possibility to make a full and efficient contribution to political, social, cultural and economic life."

President El-Hassad also said that "it is an honour for man to work, and the essence of life. The working class is the basis upon which the development process can be built. Those who work enrich life itself, and are enriched by life. Life has no meaning without work, and there is no progress without workers." The working class in our country has an essential role to play in taking economic and social decisions so that it may participate, with the social partners, in establishing and strengthening a sound national economic structure guaranteeing the increasing needs of man.

If progress in society is measured by the development of its legislation reflecting social relations, the laws and regulations in our country, with regard to labour, social insurance, the organisation of agricultural relations, vocational training and incentives to investment in the private sector to enable it to supplement the public and mixed sectors, can quite rightly be considered as being instrumental in such progress.

There can be no peace in the world as long as people are deprived of the right to self-determination, and their territories are occupied. The Syrian Arab Republic, which believes in the principles of freedom and justice, calls for a just and universal peace in the region based on international law.

Syria which opened the door to peace, when it agreed to the peace initiative based on the implementation of Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, and on the basis of exchanging land for peace. But Israel, which had rejected this initiative went back on its decision and opted for taking part in the peace negotiations, not in the interests of peace but because it is not in Israel's interest to boycott the peace initiative when the whole world was watching, especially since the world is calling for peace and the implementation of international resolutions worldwide. Instead of thwarting the peace process by means of the boycott which would have upset the international community, Israel decided, as can be seen from its behaviour in the negotiations, to block the peace process by taking part but at the same time preventing any chance of success. The entire world is convinced that Arabs want peace and Israel is rejecting it.

It is obvious from the peace negotiations that Israel refuses to discuss any withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories and avoids any discussion on basic issues. It buries itself in procedural questions to buy time and fly in the face of other parties.

It is clear that the brutal aggression waged against Southern Lebanon is, for one thing, aimed at derailing the peace process initiated by leading world powers and which was supported by people everywhere in the world.

We call for the implementation of resolutions passed by the international community, in all areas of the world where there is conflict, and one standard must apply to all.

This issue strengthens the feelings of regret and bitterness because of the discrimination seen with regard to the implementation of international resolutions. This is what recently happened with respect to the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya...

The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD)– A point of order has been raised. I give the floor to the Government delegate of Israel.

Mr. KEREM (Government delegate, Israel) – As in previous years, may I ask that the distinguished Minister be asked to stay with the rules of procedure as laid down by the Selection Committee concerning discussion of the Middle East issue, that is that that discussion be confined to the special sitting?

Original – French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. DECOSTERD – You may continue, Mr. Bozo.

Original – Arabic: Mr. BOZO – Mr. President, I was simply discussing the question of the peace negotiations.

We call upon the ILO to redouble its efforts to respond to those who have the greatest need of our assistance in South Africa, confirming its commitment to an end to apartheid and create a just society.

The South African authorities continue to infringe the rights of Black workers, to imprison them and flout their personal freedom, depriving them of their most elementary rights to work and practising discrimination in respect of wages, social security and residence.

We welcome the new member States, whose tripartite delegations are taking part in the meetings of this session.

Finally, may I wish every success to this Conference and hope that we may advance further towards the attainment of the noble objectives of the Organisation.

Mr. DAL KING (Minister of Labour, Sudan) – On behalf of the Sudanese delegation and on my own behalf, may I congratulate the President on his election. We have every confidence that his wisdom and guidance will lead this session of the Conference to a successful conclusion. Our felicitations go also to the distinguished Officers.

As we all know, the 79th Session is taking place amidst profound changes in the international arena. The pages of a new global system are now being opened, leaving behind us the turbulent decades of the Cold War. In this connection, we all hope that the future will be endowed with social justice, equality between nations, respect for different cultures and ultimately the narrowing of the horrendous gap between the North and the South in terms of well-being and quality of life.

The ILO, which is unique, will continue to have a central role in our collective endeavours and pursuits for a new and just international system. Indeed, human resources will always remain a focal element of the process of economic and social development, hence the paramount importance of this Organisation. The Director-General was indeed right to pose the question to all of us as to how we see the future of the ILO. We see it in terms of a more intensified role in technical assistance to developing countries, with more training for their labour force, preferably with a more regional focus, and naturally more resources mobilised for training.

The theme chosen by the Director-General in his Report to this session, Democratisation and the ILO, commands our attention and remain of great interest to my delegation. the reason for this is that my Government of National Salvation had already embarked on a democratic political and social system that caters for the aspirations of our people and draws from their cultural and national heritage. To this end, the National Salvation Revolution has conducted a transparent and democratic dialogue in all areas, culminating in the adoption of peace and economic strategies as well as a federal administrative structure for our country.

Furthermore, we adopted far-reaching policies of economic reform and adjustment last February, fully liberalising our economy. Exchange controls were abolished, subsidies lifted and prices deregulated. At the same time, more incentives were given to boost production and investment.

These measures were adopted along with successful agricultural policies that led to self-sufficiency in wheat, sorghum and sugar, within the context of our year 2000 overall national strategy.

Not only this, but also the important issues of trade unions and labour legislation were freely discussed in a tripartite format and in accordance with international labour standards. The outcome of this process was the enactment of the 1992 Trade Union Act. Meanwhile we are preparing for the elections of the trade unions scheduled for August 1992, and I take this opportunity to invite the ILO to attend these elections as an observer.

Let us hope that democratisation at the ILO will lead to a more meaningful and effective Organisation. Democracy can remain as an empty slogan unless social justice and eradication of poverty are achieved. We also call for democratisatiion at the international level, by making the international system truly universal and democratic in its decision-making processes.

We commend the noble work of this esteemed Organisation in prohibiting child labour and avoiding its tragic consequences for human societies. The International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour is of course, a testimony to this task. However, the southern part of my country, witnessed a grave tragedy when fifteen thousand children were forcibly recruited by the rebel movement (SPLA) and uprooted from their families in an unprecedented manner. We left no stone unturned in calling upon all humanitarian organisations to assist in ending the plight of these children, and I personally, happen to have five dependents among them. We once again declare from this rostrum that the international community must shoulder its responsibilities in freeing these children from the horrible grip of starvation, disease and untold suffering.

I have just returned from the southern part of my country, and we are trying our best to protect our civilian population from the atrocities of the rebel movement.

Let me assure you that the Sudanese Government continues to search for peace and stability in the south of our country. We are happy to note that the first round of the Abuja peace talks, which have just been ended under the highly appreciated auspices of President Ibrahim Babangida, have moved the peace process forward. It was agreed in Abuja that all parties will meet again to discuss the question of political interim arrangement for the transition period. We will continue our peace objectives and believe that a peaceful solution is attainable.

Our delegation congratulates the ILO for inviting a dedicated son of Africa, Mr. Frederick Chiluba, the President of Zambia, to address this session. We also welcome the new eight members who have joined this Organisation and indeed their contribution to our work will be greatly appreciated and makes the ILO more universal.

Finally, we lend our unflinching support to the process of dismantling apartheid in South Africa. Our delegation also looks forward to the special sitting on Palestine next week, and we hope that this process will lead to a special committee on Palestine, in recognition of the just and legitimate rights of the Palestinian people under the PLO leadership.

Mr. RWEGASIRA (Minister of Labour and Youth Development, United Republic of Tanzania) – It is an honour for me, my delegation, and the people of the United Republic of Tanzania to be accorded this opportunity to address this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me, first of all, to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the presidency of this Conference. I am optimistic that under his wise leadership our deliberations will undoubtedly be fruitful. I would also like to extend, on my own behalf and on behalf of my delegation, congratulations to the other Officers of the Conference on their election.

May I commend the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the role of the ILO. Democratisation is currently a world-wide phenomenon but is having very contrasting effects and repercussions in different countries. For countries like the Republic of Tanzania, this process has meant the democratisation of a new dimension. It has entailed not only the adoption of political pluralism but also austerity and stringent policies in the public sector. The adoption of structural adjustment programmes has brought about extensive liberalisation of the key sectors of the national economy, removal of price control systems, readjustment of exchange rates resulting in a steep devaluation of the national currency, eradication of subsidies, restructuring of parastatal companies, retrenchment and several other measures of far-reaching social consequence.

These measures have already begun to have an effect on the area of human resources and the socio-economic well-being of the country. In adopting these measures, the state of unemployment is bound to worsen. These policies are admittedly geared to reduce public expenditure and increase production; but at the same time they result in the layoff of enormous numbers of workers, thus denying them employment which is a basic human right.

Whatever we do, trade liberalisation, structural adjustment, unfavourable terms of trade and the debt burden are bound to make the lives of the majority of our people difficult. They will not appreciate the benefits of democratisation unless they obtain the basic needs of life such as food, health, shelter and employment. The workers must, therefore, be assured of adequate wages, while the peasants must be assured of remunerative prices for their produce so as to earn a decent living.

Thus democracy to a hungry and suffering populace might mean more political, economical and cultural chaos. To support global stability, the North must be willing to transfer resources to the South in order to supplement the meagre resources of developing countries.

Unless measures are taken to alleviate this situation, poverty and instability are bound to engulf the enforcers of these policies. As stipulated in the Preamble of the Constitution of the ILO: "universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice". Steps will have to be taken to ensure that those affected by policies adopted still have means to survive and earn a decent living in spite of retrenchment. This we believe is the whole idea of social justice: improving the living standards of our citizens, be it through giving them jobs, salary increases and – where formal employment is not available – the granting of credit at favourable terms and other economic boosting measures for those forced to turn to the informal sector for self-employment.

Undoubtedly these issues are crucial and the ILO has a definite role to play if democratisation is to have any meaning to countries like the United Republic of Tanzania. I am happy to say that our country has already started taking measures to make the process of democratisation more meaningful. The informal sector has been given more thrust to expand its activities at all levels. Vocational training programmes are providing individuals with skills to enable them either to seek formal employment or venture into self-employment undertakings – individually or on a cooperative basis. It is in this context that I would like to express the Republic of Tanzania's profound appreciation to the ILO and other agencies for the technical, financial and moral assistance in making these endeavours not only possible but also successful.

I would like to draw your attention to the prevailing conditions in South Africa. While we rejoice at the positive developments to bring about change and think that the measures taken so far are encouraging, we are of the strong opinion that it is still too soon to do away with the ILO Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, and sanctions against the minority regime, as racial discrimination is still in place. We should not take it for granted that apartheid is no more, for it may be recalled that the recent "white only" referendum reflects the fact that apartheid is still very much alive. The United Republic of Tanzania would like to call upon other member States to keep up the pressure of sanctions to speed up the process of change in South Africa, in line with United Nations resolutions.

Allow me to comment on the agenda item on the prevention of industrial disasters. Discussion of this issue is certainly timely, not only for industrialised countries – especially those which have already suffered industrial disasters – but also developing countries such as the United Republic of Tanzania which is still in the early stages of industrialisation; indeed, a discussion of this item gives these countries the opportunity to prepare for any possible disasters. As the saying goes: "prevention is better than cure."

Original – French: Mr. ABOULAHCEN BENYAHIA (Employers' delegate, Morocco) – I would like to begin by endorsing what has been said by many previous speakers in warmly congratulating the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to high office in this Conference.

I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the activities undertaken by the International Labour Organisation, which constantly seeks to reconcile the twin aims of development and social process on a solid and credible basis, namely tripartism. At the same time, I would like to extend to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General of the ILO, my great esteem and my thanks because in his Report, which deals with one of the most important topics of our time, he has been bold and frank, and has sought to define the methodology of a strategy which, as far as possible, gives us a clear picture of the immense changes taking place in the world today. These changes can foster economic development and social progress only if they are backed up by the existence of real and effective democracy.

Democracy is the sure path which leads to a better future for all of us; in practice, it can satisfy the aspirations of all economic and social partners only if it is implemented and practised properly. This is the keystone of all that we do, and the aim which we constantly seek to attain.

In the world of today, we welcome the international détente achieved in the realm of international relations. This leads us to urge the ILO to try even harder and to make a greater contribution to addressing the concerns of the various economic and social partners.

We are fully convinced that it is vital to establish a climate of concertation and dialogue so as to develop a spirit of understanding and, at the very least, to avoid worsening the social problems experienced in many countries. It is also necessary to construct an environment in which democratic processes in political and economic life can flourish and social justice can reign supreme.

It is clear that we are now witnessing rapid and profound changes in the world economy. This economy is characterised, among other things, by liberalism, privatisation and by a new spirit of enterprise.

The free market economy assuredly represents a vital component in the implementation of democracy. Hence, in many countries signs of democracy are beginning to emerge and the climate has become considerably more favourable for private entreprises, whether national or foreign. Undoubtedly, the private sector has a fundamental role to play as a source of economic growth and technological development. But we must not forget its primary function in the process of dialogue and concertation, and its contribution to social progress.

Aware of the role played by the private sector and aware of the process of liberalisation and democratisation in political and economic life, the Moroccan authorities, under the enlightened guidance of His Majesty, King Hassan II – may God glorify him – have long sought to establish an effective structure to develop and expand the various processes aimed at promoting liberalism, privatisation, respect for human rights, social dialogue, and so on.

Our country's policy is to give the private sector a more active and wide-ranging role so that enterprises may become the engine of development. This attitude is reflected in an increasingly liberal economic environment which opens up new prospects for employers and enables them to contribute to national growth and development. In this environment, our Chambers of Commerce and Industry and their federation are gradually becoming one of the key players in economic and social development.

Alongside these achievements, we should note the strengthening of the ongoing dialogue between the Government and the economic and social partners. For Morocco, dialogue has always been part of our democratic tradition, but in recent years it has been enhanced by the incorporation of tripartism.

This process of tripartism is nothing other than the transposition into social relations of the principles which lie at the heart of political democracy: freedom, pluralism and the participation of interested parties in decisions which concern them, as has been emphasised by the Director-General.

Indeed, the Moroccan Government and the Moroccan employers attach great importance to social questions, particularly those relating to workers and enterprise, as evidenced by substantial wage increases, family allowances, the revision of benefit schemes, greater social security and the revision of pension schemes.

As regards employment production, new arrangements have been made for loans for the creation of small and medium-sized enterprises.

In short, ongoing contacts have provided an opportunity for an exchange of views in which trade union representatives are informed of the Government's intentions, and in which the Government learns more of the concerns of the various social and economic partners.

As an employers' representative, I am encouraged to note that the dialogue which has begun is being conducted smoothly and responsibly, and in the light of the national interest.

In the democratic environment, the Chambers of Commerce and Industry and their federation have originated many proposals, thanks to the support and backing of their members, and thanks also to the help they have received from the Government. Indeed, the Chambers now have the opportunity and means to play an active part in events and to influence what happens by defending the general interests of commerce and industry.

In our view, the progress that has been made will enable our Organisation to develop further and to contribute to consolidating democracy in our country. We hope that our federation will see greater technical cooperation with the ILO, and that this will encourage us in performing our task and in addressing our problems. Indeed, our problems are very similar to those faced by employers' organisations in all African countries: how to foster a spirit of enterprise; how to develop small and medium-sized business in urban and rural areas in order to provide employment for young graduates; and how to develop social security and a welfare system during periods of structural change.

Before concluding, I would like to say that the agenda of this session includes some very important items which directly concern the improvement of living conditions and working conditions, the promotion of employment and social progress, human rights, and individual and collective freedoms.

I am convinced that our work will be crowned with success.

Mr. COLUMBUS (Workers' delegate, Fiji) – I would like to join the delegates of the countries assembled here in congratulating the President on his election to head this session of the International Labour Conference.

I would also like to take this opportunity to extend best wishes and warm fraternal greetings to the ILO and the Director-General from the workers of Fiji, and our thanks for the support which the workers have received from the ILO in recent years.

Fiji is returning to the International Labour Conference this year after an absence of six years. I am pleased to be part of the tripartite Fiji delegation, and I hope that Fiji's return to the Conference bodes well for Fiji's future membership of the ILO, and for its commitment to consultation and cooperation on a tripartite basis to foster and facilitate a climate of industrial relations which will promote development and progress in Fiji.

Workers in Fiji welcome the Government's renewed relationship with the ILO and trust that this will be further manifested by the ratification of several international labour Conventions by the Government of Fiji – a matter which has been neglected for many years. The Government must now devote itself to the implementation and application of the provisions of those Conventions which have been ratified.

As many of you are aware, Fiji has just emerged from a difficult period. For the past five years we have been without a parliamentary democracy. It was only at the end of May that elections were held, and the interim Government which had ruled Fiji since 1987 has now been replaced by an elected parliamentary Government and a new Constitution which was promulgated in 1990.

Following the military coups of 1987, which shook the democratic foundations of our country, the interim government strove to restore the economy of Fiji. While their intentions were laudable, their economic policies and programmes were largely at the expense of workers on the premise of emphasis on exports and their cost-competitiveness. The interim Government instituted reforms deregulating the economy. These reforms have had serious short and long-term negative impacts on workers which we brought to the attention of the interim Government. It was a classic case of the rich getting richer and the workers getting poorer. Economic policies must address the expectations of both employers and workers.

In this tenuous situation, the interim Government nevertheless proceeded to implement labour decrees which suppressed workers' rights. Workers in Fiji, led by the Fiji Trades Union Congress, and with the support of other bodies, including the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, oppose these so-called labour reforms which seriously diminish the hard-won rights that workers in Fiji had acquired and exercised over many years. We believe the reforms breach certain international labour Conventions. A complaint has been filed with the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labour Conference concerning the labour decrees which were promulgated in November 1991.

I must state, in no uncertain terms, that the entire Fiji Trades Union Congress rejects the labour reforms as it believes that suppressing the rights of workers and taking away facilities which the trade unions have achieved over several years of struggle is a negative approach which is bound to be counterproductive. We call on the Government of Fiji to withdraw the suppressive legislation imposed on the workers of Fiji in the guise of labour reforms.

I call on the Government of Fiji to recognise the Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) as the national centre representing the workers of Fiji and to enter into dialogue with us without delay. This consultative process is a priority for workers in Fiji. It should be carried out within a reactivated tripartite forum where meaningful and substantive consultations can take place and firm agreements can be reached by the social partners for the betterment and progress of the country.

Fiji is embarking on a new era. We now have an elected parliamentary government. There has just been a major change in the composition of the FTUC Management Board. We are looking ahead. The workers of Fiji count on the ILO to provide technical support for the consultations between the social partners. There are serious issues ahead of us in Fiji, especially concerning the constitution of the Republic of Fiji and the rights of workers. Workers in Fiji are committed to working together in good faith with the new government and with employers to resolve these issues in the best interests of workers and their families and the nation as a whole. A satisfied worker produces more; more production means increased economic and social progress.

Workers in Fiji appreciate the support which the ILO has provided for workers' education programmes. It is only through workers' education that a workforce is aware of its rights and obligations. The workers of Fiji trust and pray that the ILO's support for workers' education activities will continue.

I wish to congratulate the ILO for its vision and foresight in selecting democratisation as the theme for the Director-General's Report to the Conference. This Report is particularly relevant to Fiji since the 1990 Constitution violates many of the democratic precepts so eloquently explained in this Report. From my personal status as a son of two principal communities in Fiji, I can attest to the intensity of feelings in the country over the 1990 Constitution. Provision exists in the constitution for a review before 1997. During the national election campaign, many candidates expressed a willingness to pursue a dialogue on the constitution. In order to re-establish a harmonious balance among the peoples of Fiji, the workers – and indeed all persons who wish to see our multi-racial society coalesce and progress – are anxious that this dialogue should take place. International labour standards and those sections of the Report of the Director-General in particular which relate to human rights, indigenous people and trade union rights, should be a major reference in any dialogue on the constitution.

Without the ILO, I wonder where the workers of the world would be today, especially in developing and underdeveloped countries of the world? As a representative of the workers of Fiji, I therefore welcome the opportunity to speak to this august assembly. We, the workers, undertake to work with the ILO so that our rights can be strengthened and our conditions improved.

In the final analysis, and in closing, may I say that we the workers are not anti-national, but are dedicated to the improvement of our working conditions in which every government also claims to be interested. The solution, therefore, as we see it, is for all of us to work together, since our goals are the same.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

Eleventh sitting

Tuesday, 9 June 1992, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Solórzano Martínez

Original – Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SOLORZANO MARTINEZ) – We will now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. POSADA DE LA PENA (Government delegate Colombia) – I praise the Director-General for having chosen the the role of the ILO in the present democratisation process as the subject of his Report, and I am pleased that this topic is the main item on our agenda. As Mr. Hansenne clearly stated, democracy is different from other forms of political organisation because of the value it ascribes to freedom and equality, basic principles of this Organisaiton.

Last year, at this same Conference, I mentioned the deliberations which were being carried out in my country by a popularly elected Constituent Assembly convened at the initiative of the present Government. A new Constitution was promulgated in order to broaden popular participation and to consolidate the rules of democracy, which, as I expressed on that occasion, have always guided Colombia.

According to article 1 of our new Constitution, "Colombia is a State of law, organised in the form of a unitary republic, decentralised, with autonomous territorial units, democratic, participatory and pluralistic, based on the respect of human dignity, on the work and solidarity of the individuals who make it up and on the prevalence of the general interest."

We Colombians are therefore in full agreement with the words contained in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO.

As the Director-General states in his Report, countries subject to totalitarian regimes considered that the material well-being of their peoples could not be improved without modifying the economic model; they have therefore firmly undertaken a transition towards a market economy, because they have considered this to be a guarantee of prosperity and a necessary complement of their new political freedom. Certainly, the fall of the Berlin wall, as noted by the Director-General, is the symbol of this change.

It is also important that the Director-General commented on the tendency of States to reduce their participation in productive and trading activities in order to devote greater attention to the regulation of economic activity. My Government is no exception. By explaining the Government's policies to the Congress elected last year, President Gaviria explained that the objective was not to dismantle the role of the State, but to transform it so that it might accomplish its proper task, not interfere in areas outside its competence, and offer the citizens what they truly need. Privatisation, said President Gaviria, is not an indiscriminate therapy nor a cure for all diseases.

I should also like to recall the Director-General's statement to the effect that the law of the market cannot be the law of the jungle. As noted by Pope John Paul II, it is necessary to keep capitalism in check, given that we have to struggle for a society based on free work, on enterprise, and on participation.

I consider of equal importance the statement by the Director-General of the ILO advocating the reorganisation of public administration and its reduction to reasonable proportions.

The Colombian Government is undertaking great efforts to modernise the State. This implies, naturally, the restructuring of some government agencies, the suppression of others, and the reduction of staff payrolls, with the associated difficulties. The Congress of the Republic and the Government have provided measures to protect public servants, compensating them adequately when they are left jobless. In this connection, I agree with the view expressed by the Director-General, to the effect that administrations should be reduced to the "reasonable proportions".

The Director-General has said that the end of the Cold War, and the progress made in the field of disarmament, should allow for peace dividends and the wise use of these resources, that is, for social purposes we hope this call will be heeded by rich countries because, as Mr. Hansenne notes, "There would be little point in introducing or restoring democratic values if doing so did not offer a cure for poverty, inequality and exploitation."

The Director-General affirms that the best guarantees for internal stability and social peace lies in the appropriate protection of the most vulnerable groups of the population, and advocates the extension of social security to the entire population.

By declaring that social security is a compulsory public service, the new Colombian Constitution adds that the State, with the participation of individuals, will progressively extend its coverage. Naturally, like many other countries, we face difficulties because resources are scarce, and the expansion of these services demands great economic sacrifices. In this respect, it is interesting to note the Director-General's argument on the role of international organisations, including the ILO, as regards the assistance needed in many countries, since the international community "cannot afford to ignore the matter of social protection: political stability is at stake".

The Director-General has identified three important fields of action for the ILO: (a) the respect for basic human rights, particularly in the world of work; (b) a strong action to foster a market economy with social dimension; and (c) the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining.

Regarding the first item, the Government of Colombia has been carrying out a singular task. It demands that all authorities and the Ministry of Justice, headed by the Attorney General, an autonomous official, protect human rights and ensure their effectiveness, with the support of the Defender of the People. The main function of this new public servant is to ensure the promotion, exercise and information of human rights.

Regarding the second item, enterprises in my country as the basis for development, have a social funtion that implies certain obligations. Thus the Constitution stipulates that "economic activity and private initiative are free, within the limits of common well-being", and that "free economic competition is a right for all, but implies responsibilities".

Colombia is applying the model of political liberalisation in an effort to enhance its integration with the world community and to keep up with the new trends of market liberalisation, referred to in the Director-General's Report.

Finally, tripartism also deserves our support. We think that the ideal thing is to reach a consensus on social and labour policies with capital and labour. The Colombian Parliament, in discussing legislation, is calling for dialogue and the participation of all sectors concerned. Both the Congress and the Government are advocates of reaching the greatest degrees of concertation, without avoiding their own responsibilities.

Allow me to refer, in conclusion, to the right to strike, long recognised by the Colombian Constitution, but not yet the subject of an ILO Convention. The Director-General points out that, regarding universality, the Organisation has had to work with countries governed by very different political systems; and the adds that sometimes, to conciliate its universal character and the authentic values of tripartism, it has had to act very pragmatically. Perhaps this pragmatic attitude explains the absence of a Convention on the right to strike. But now that the Berlin wall has fallen, a historical fact noted by the Director-General in his Report, there is no reason for the Organisation not to deal with the right to strike. It is true that ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association has interpreted that the Conventions on freedom of association and the right to organise implicitly recognise the right to strike of the workers as a means of defending their economic interests. But this is a simple interpretation by a committee, indeed a very generalised interpretation, without the force of an international instrument.

These are the reasons that led my Government to urge the Director-General, in October last year, to include the question of a Convention on the right to strike on the agenda of this Conference. The Governing Body considered that, given the complexity of the subject, it would be better not to discuss it directly but to include it in a possible general discussion on the settlement of labour disputes. My Government trusts that its proposal will be considered at a later date.

The Committee on Freedom of Association has stated that in matters of strikes in public services, for instance, the interruption of activities may be allowed, with the exception of services whose interruption would endanger the life, security or health of all or part of the population. On other occasions, the same Committee has admitted that the right to strike may be subject to restrictions, including prohibitions, in the case of public functions or essential services, to the extent that the right to strike may cause major prejudice or problems to the national community. The Committee has considered that strikes of a purely political nature do not fall within the principles of freedom of association, thereby timidly suggesting that they should be prohibited. It has also expressed doubts on the legitimacy of strikes which are not decided by the majority of workers, and has observed that in cases of prohibition one should have recourse to compulsory arbitration procedures.

There are other items that should come under an instrument on the question of strikes: the condemnation to acts of violence, terrorism, or sabotage against the property of enterprises; the serious consequences that strikes of long duration may have on the national economy. These are items, which, given their importance, should not be subject to simple conclusions of a Committee, regardless of its importance. The ILO, 73 years after its inception, has not been able to deal with this fundamental right of the workers, while other questions of less importance for the latter have deserved the attention of a Convention. I believe the time has come to deal with this subject.

I wish to extend my compliments to all delegates to this Conference, and my congratulations to the Officers for their deserved election.

Original – Spanish: Mr. FERRER DUFOL (Employers' delegate, Spain) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his election at the head of this Session of the International Labour Conference. For the Spanish employers, it is a great satisfaction that the Presidency has been entrusted to a neighbouring country, Portugal, and to such a renowed person so experienced in social dialogue, which no doubt is the best safeguard for the smooth conduct of the work of the Conference.

Likewise, I should like to extend my congratulations to the Vice-Presidents and the Director-General for the wisdom of having included, for general discussion in this assembly, a subject so topical and important as Democratisation and the ILO.

The Report of the Director-General is a topical and committed analysis of the situation of democracy in the world, of the respective responsibility of governments, employers and workers to develop it throughout the world, and of the role that the ILO and other multilateral organisations must and can play in this process.

I am sure that this text, enriched by the contributions of the three groups in this general discussion, will be an essential benchmark, both for standard-setting and for the technical cooperation activities and other programmes of the ILO.

Personally, I shall attempt to contribute to this discussion from the employers' viewpoint, taking into account the experience of Spain.

As the Report of the Director-General so aptly points out, democracy and the market economy are two concepts which are inextricably linked. One of the most important challenges, therefore, which face countries making this transition towards political democracy is, precisely, a change in the economic system. One of the key elements of the democratic model is the definition of an economic and legal framework which will foster the creation of undertakings and guarantee the proper functioning of market mechanisms.

A social structure of groups organised to defend legitimate interests is a fundamental principle in any democratisation process.

The independence of such organisations from interference by public authorities is another factor to be taken into account if a true dialogue is to be sustained in the social and economic field on the basis of tripartism.

With legal restrictions to collective autonomy and an interventionist attitude on the part of public authorities, there is not much to be hoped from consultation.

Social dialogue is only possible, by definition, in a free system in which employers' and workers' organisations which are free, representative and well-structured, negotiate and seek a consensus.

We welcome the efforts of many employers throughout the world, and particularly those of the Eastern and Central European countries, to set up free organisations which represent the plurality of the employers and contribute to the economic development of countries with a philosophy based on initiative and a spirit of enterprise.

In the Spanish Employers' Confederation Organisation (CEOE), we are seeking to cooperate with the employers' organisations of those countries, contributing not only our recent experience in restructuring the organisation of Spanish management, but also financing specific programmes for the training in Spain of executives from undertakings in those countries.

Consultation then is first and foremost a method of making democracy function economically and socially which, assuming autonomy, freedom to make decisions and the protection of different interests, facilitates agreement on those objectives to be reached which are of paramount importance for the economy of a particular country.

Allow me to restate before this Conference our commitment to a model which is essential to such principles. We see it proved, not only through our most recent history but on a daily basis through negotiation of more thant 4,000 collective agreements which are signed in our country each year.

However, today an attempt is being made to devalue the beneficial effects which consultation has had for Spain in the past decade. This is all the more disquieting when my country has problems of capacity and competition with its partners in the Community and is committed to a strategy based on dialogue and not on tension lack of communication and radicalism.

Some recent experiences which we have had in Spain reveal a change in the nature of organisations which must focus their activities on the social and economic field.

It is quite legitimate to be opposed to social and economic policies formulated by governments. But this opposition should not make us set aside resolutions by the highest sectors of the State which are part of the democratic system and guarantee the legitimacy of decisions. Such opposition generates a sterile process of social conflicts.

It is useful for the democratic development of a country to have institutional frameworks which will allow an ongoing social dialogue.

In Spain, where there is rich and varied experience of negotiation and agreements at summit level, the Economic and Social Council for which legislation was enacted one year ago has not yet been set up.

This situation cannot be considered positive. In the face of these facts we must recognise that social dialogue is becoming rare and is converging into political struggle far removed from the interests of the groups which such organisations say they represent. The political reservations and preconditions that precede decisions lead to paralysis, while in other countries efforts are made to improve economic and social well-being.

The Spanish employers have always defended the supremacy of dialogue over interference and confrontation, despite the fact that we have been merely passive subjects of the agreements between the government and certain trade unions of my country, even though they affect us directly. This Organisation is familiar with some recent examples of what I am pointing out.

However, democratic systems are built on institutions set up to defend damaged interests. This should not be taken as an obstacle to maintaining an attitude fully open to dialogue, taking into account the opportunities which are opening up to our country within the framework of European construction.

Our society is becoming richer and more complex. The role of the undertaking as a means of creating the wealth from which the whole of society benefits is being strengthened. This evolution that we are witnessing is alarming to some who oppose the variety which dominates in our society today with greater homogeneity and uniformity.

If we wish to build up a free society, we have to have a voluntary, responsible membership and accept common values as well as the cooperation of the individual, perceived as a unique resource to be developed, enhanced and professionalised.

Hence, the importance of training demands the entrepreneurial spirit that the International Labour Organisation wishes to promote in the immediate future.

Today, in all countries throughout the world, we are trying to stimulate the spirit of enterprise. Innovation in the ILO must respond to the requirements of its members, extending its programmes in these fields, particularly in respect of entrepreneurial training and management training and the development of small and medium undertakings.

The recent resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in these fields and those adopted by the United Nations, in particular the International Development Strategy, constitute an obligatory benchmark and sufficiently clear guidelines for both the ILO and its member States.

In this way, we, the employers' organisations, support the democratisation processes which are being undertaken currently in many regions of the world. We are aware of the need to encourage private initiative as a model for the creation of wealth. Let us not forget, however, the importance of continuing with this process in a spirit of constructive dialogue and consultation with the other social partners, which will lead to greater progress, as has been demonstrated in Spain during the recent past.

Original – Spanish: Mr. DIAZ (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Argentina) – I would like to take this first opportunity of taking the floor at this Conference, to congratulate the President on his election. We are sure that our work will be successful under his guidance. I should also like to congratulate the other Officers.

I also congratulate the Director-General on the choise of subject for his Report this year, which offers us the opportunity to discuss one of the most important issues of our time – democracy and its globalisation as a dominant political system. This forum is the legitimate and proper place to discuss this subject. For more than 70 years of its history the ILO has seen many other political systems born and throughout this time the ILO has given its support to democracy with its professional realism and its untiring energy. As regimes which sought supremacy now disappear, democracy moves forward vigorously to the next millennium and the ILO continues to be a valuable witness of the close interaction between labour, democracy and justice.

Democracy as a value, as a utopian vision of a political order, which is felt to be good and desirable, has become part ot the modern order at a practically global level for some time now. But the question concerns democracy as an historical political regime and it is here that the battle has not been universally won. This is why it is so important that the Director-General has selected this subject as the focal point for his Report and this discussion.

In essence, at this level where few adjectives and no reductions are possible, democracy is the institutionalised exercise of popular sovereigty in the search for the common good. It is a specific dialectic between these two elements – popular sovereighty and the common good – which can be expressed in various ways: democracy and development, participation and efficiency, the democratic process and democratic effects, etc. This is not merely a theoretical argument. Our perception of the way of fighting for democracy and defending will depend on the way we understand the relationship between the democratic process and democratic effects.

In the present state of affairs, there is a certain tendency to emphasise the undeniable importance of democratic "effects" – development, human rights, the modernisation of the economy, social policies, etc., and to underplay the decisive relevance of the democratic "process". An example of what I am saying can be found in the Director-General's Report which says "there would be little point in introducing or restoring democratic values if doing so did not offer a cure for poverty, inequality and exploitation."

I know that the Director-General is asking this question in the interests of democracy and I in the interests of social justice would like to say: yes, it would in fact be very useful and indeed has been very useful to restore such values.

Let us take a look at the experience of history. Eastern Europe is a clear example: for decades the democratic process as such was subordinated to the achievement of social and economic objectives; today we know the results of all this: Gulag and poverty. Another clear example of military authoritarianism, which supposedly sought social and economic progress although it was a negation of the democratic process, produced equally negative results: more poverty, more backwardness, more social exclusion, accompanied by legal arbitrariness, repression and even war.

It is not possible to separate democracy as a political process from democratic effects. The democratic process as an appropriate political order is now a condition of development and justice. Only when we stimulate and defend democracy as a process can we create the conditions for the respect of human rights, freedom, the modernisation of the economy and justice.

In this respect I would like to make one or two other clarifications. When we speak of "democratisation" we are not speaking of an abstract process. We are speaking of the actual life of people and of their struggles. Democracy and the institutionalisation of the exercise of popular sovereignty are not automatically the fruits of the development of societies but the results of the deliberate efforts of peoples. And this result, the establishment of democracy, is a conquest. And so to support democratisation is to support the political struggle which it implies; and to defend democracy is to help preserve this conquest.

The Director-General, in the introduction to his Report, asks the Conference how the ILO may help in the task of overcoming obstacles and meeting the challenge of democratisation. And the same Report points out in its conclusions some suggestions which I share and support and which in substance refer to a programme of action which gives priority to promoting democracy, providing assistance in the struggle against poverty and encouraging the protection of workers.

However, I believe it is necessary to develop a second line of action concerning the defence of the democracy which has already been achieved. Because the effective exercise of representative democracy is the best and almost the only guarantee for the full respect of human rights, development and justice; and the existence of parliaments elected directly and freely by the people on a multi-party basis is, as the Report emphasises, its most powerful characteristic.

This defence is based essentially on the people and we must not supplant them but collaborate with them in this. It is not a question of importing foreign political models but neither is it a question, in the name of originality, to accept flagrant contradictions of popular sovereignty. We must be aware of the importance of international action when it is exercised collectively for the defence of commonly shared values to keep at bay any unacceptable return to any form of authoritarianism or dictatorship.

In this sense and with a view to providing the ILO with the institutional instruments enabling it to provide an effective defence of democratically representative regimes, I put the following proposals to the Governing Body: (1) that it make the necessary arrangements to hold specialised meetings to draw up and preparate a set of effective timely and expeditious procedures to ensure the promotion and defence of democracy in the member States of the Organisation; (2) that a set of proposals and initiatives for the preservation and strengthening of democratic systems be drawn up on the basis of international solidarity and cooperation, within the framework of the principles enshrined in the Preamble of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia; (3) that it study the possibility of amending the Consitution of the ILO to permit the suspension of those governments of member States of the Organisation in which acts occur resulting in an abrupt or irregular interruption of the democratic institutional political process or the legitimate exercise of the power of a democratically elected government.

In the same way, the Government delegation of Argentina will submit amendments to the resolution concerning the development of democracy.

I am not unaware of the complexity of the subject or the difficulties of my proposal. But the risks of anti-democratic regression exist and have materialised; and the International Labour Organisation must by its nature and its tradition be prepared to confront these risks and defuse them.

Original – Italian: Mr. CANDUCCI (Minister of Labour and Cooperation, San Marino) – Before turning to the topics under discussion at this session of the Conference, allow me to express my congratulations to the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The delegation of the Republic of San Marino takes note of the Director-General's Report and appreciates the efforts made by the Organisation in 1991 to promote development throughout the world, in the light of the ILO's guiding principles.

We are convinced that in addition to continuous efforts to improve the technological and economic situation of all countries, it is very timely to attach special importance to the defence of human rights, the improvement of living and working conditions and greater equity between North and South.

The democratisation process in various countries must be coupled with a free market to achieve a genuine liberalisation of the economy and complete democracy. Economic progress and the free market are therefore two absolutely interdependent concepts.

It is up to the State, particularly in countries where democracy is new and in developing countries where private initiative is weak, to strengthen and promote democracy and free markets.

To avoid the growing imbalance between rich and poor countries, international organisations such as the United Nations must play a more active role and seek to foster a more balanced development, since market forces alone are not enough.

The rights of minorities, which face the risk of increasing exclusion, and of the poor, whose numbers continue to grow, even in developed countries require, a major effort of cooperation and solidarity amongst all the countries.

The Republic of San Marino, which a few months ago became a fully fledged Member of the United Nations, intends to do its share to ensure that the weak are not crushed by the harsh laws of the market.

Our country, small in size but with a long history, has always tried to subscribe to the fundamental principle of democracy: freedom, human dignity and social justice.

The laws in our country which protect the disabled, women and the aged, have been amended recently to meet new requirements more fully. Our social policy will be enhanced soon through pension legislation which will provide a better balance between wage-earners and self-employed workers and complement the provisions which already guarantee a secure future for all retired people.

Recently, new legislation on occupational safety and health has entered into force.

A vocational training Bill aims at helping young people to enter the labour market with a proper preparation, in part by making education compulsory up until the age of 16.

Vocational training must also play a fundamental role in the world of work so as to help new jobseekers and to provide retraining to enable workers to adapt to industrial restructuring.

A new Act on cooperatives seeks to offer incentives to young people who wish to work and yet retain a measure of autonomy.

Employers' and workers' organisations have recently reached an agreement on a new system to maintain the purchasing power of wages, thereby discarding the obsolete sliding-scale system. The Government has concluded a similar agreement for public servants.

These agreements will enable us to achieve a better balance in labour costs, and to eliminate automatic wage adjustments, which introduced an independent variable in the setting of wages.

This improvement is the fruit of improved relations between workers and employers. A similar effort is being undertaken between the trade unions of public servants and the Government.

These agreements, which reflect a collaborative approach by all parties, establish new procedures for the settlement of disputes and for the renegotiation of collective agreements, with the objective of fostering well-balanced development.

In San Marino tripartsm is an established practice; representatives of employers' and workers' associations participate in committees responsible for social and economic issues and in the Governing Body of the Social Security Institute which handles health, prevention and social insurance.

The Government, together with employers' and workers' organisations, manages a social fund for canteens, day-care centres, housing and the financing of refresher courses.

The Republic of San Marino is happy to greet the new countries that have just become Members of the International Labour Organisation – the new Baltic States, the Slavic States and the Far Eastern States. At the same time, we express our serious concern as regards the conflicts that afflict entire populations and are leading to death, forced migration and poverty and causing great suffering, particularly for the aged and for women and children. Within our possibilities, we are ready to cooperate to put an end to so much injustice, and to look for ways to contribute for the economic growth of developing countries and countries which have recently introduced market economies.

Our country is already preparing bilateral agreements for vocational training and exchanges in the tourism and hotel sector.

San Marino is in favour of an international Convention for the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer, and it is greatly interested in all measures which seek to combine economic economic development and the conservation of the environment by preventing pollution and the risk of environmental disasters.

Our delegation reiterates its appreciation for the work carried out by the International Labour Organisation and for the future programme which will undoutedly attempts to harmonise the process of democratisation and the introduction of market economies with a wise social policy which will enable citizens of all countries to take part with equal dignity in the distribution of wealth. Markets are the means, but human development is the end.

Original – French: Mrs. SMET (Minister of Employment and Labour, Belgium) – First of all, I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The success of this Conference depends on the quality of the deliberations, the smooth running of business and the ability of the Conference to arrive at conclusions as regards the items placed upon the agenda. I am certain that under his guidance our Conference will be successful in its work.

It is my honour to participate for the first time in the work of the Conference and I hope that I shall be able to make a contribution to your deliberations. I greatly appreciate the remarkable spirit prevailing here, which brings together the representatives of the Governments, employers and workers.

I welcome the fact that the ILO Director-General has put forward as the main topic of the Conference, Democratisation and the ILO. We have noted that for several years the process of democratisation has been accelerated, not only in Europe but also in other continents. In this forum, it is not necessary to dwell upon the implications of the concept of democracy and the implementation of democratisation throughout the world. I agree with the conclusions of the Director-General who in his Report states that a political democracy has little chance of survival if it does not go hand in hand with social justice.

For social justice is the cornerstone of any democratisation process and no form of discrimination in this area can be accepted. It is in this context that I feel that the International Labour Organisation has a vital role to play, in particular through its cooperation programmes which must become integrated within the socio-economic policies of its member States.

Just as there cannot be democracy without social justice, so there cannot be democracy without the respect of fundamental rights. In this respect, I believe it is essential to remember that the respect for human rights is a universal principle enshrined in international law and has for several years gained great recognition and status in international relations. In this area, whatever progress is made in democratisation, there can be no reason for compromising. Indeed this is how I understood the Director-General's Report and this is how I see the synergistical relationship between the respect for human rights and technical cooperation.

The ILO has always had a keen interest in these basic rights and I welcome the work which it has done, for instance, in the area of child labour. This issue is important to me and I have submitted a Bill to the Belgian Parliament on child labour in order to oppose the development of child employment for advertising and show business.

The ILO must update its own standards. Standard-setting must become more efficient and better adapted to the present-day conditions If we ignore this need, then we will run into conflict with more recent standards set by other international organisations.

The issue of the prohibition of night work for women has clearly pinpointed this problem. Is this not a good time to consider this in detail?

Conflicts can also arise from the manner in which standards are set. Within the International Labour Organisation, the social partner participate actively in the decision-making process. The social dialogue carried on in this forum makes it possible – in the case of all subjects under discussion – to take into account many different points of view and interests; and this gives balance to the solutions which we find to the problems before us. However, this form of social dialogue does not exist in the same way within the European Community. And this is why I welcome the agreement on social policy within the context of the Maastricht Treaty on European Union. This Treaty will, I am sure, enter into force on 1 January 1993. In this agreement, the contracting States have agreed to leave a degree of contractual responsibility to the social partners to replace legislative work by the community or to supplement such work; and here I would appeal to the social partners to organise themselves better at the European level so that they can grasp these new opportunities before them as soon as possible.

Before coming to the end of my speech I should like to make a point which to me is extremely important. Since the advent of international détente, Belgium has supported the work carried out by those countries which to engage upon a process of democratisation. However, co-operation with the countries of Central and Eastern Europe should not make us overlook co-operation with developing countries.

The young democracies of Latin America and Africa deserve our attention just as much. We feel that the ILO could further stimulate this North-South dialogue by creating possibilities and opportunities for meetings between ministers and social partners. For instance, I recently signed in Prague a joint Declaration with my colleagues from the Ministries of Employment and Labour of the Czechoslovakia and of Tunisia concerning co-operation in labour. Under this Declaration, three countries from three different regions will implement technical co-operation in the field of labour through an exchange of experiences and resources. Belgium, I believe, is a good country to work in such a context because of its experience and relationships with other countries.

Convinced that the ILO must update its objectives and activities, I should like to urge the Conference to support the Director-General's guidelines for action from now until the end of this century. These guidelines set out to promote tripartism and stress that democratisation is a pre-requisite for development. I feel that they are particularly relevant because they do not neglect the social dimension of structural adjustment in countries which are forced to carry out drastic reforms of their economies.

These guidelines revive the war on poverty through initiatives to support employment and social protection.

They muster the full use of human resources, especially in the informal structure without forgetting that protection of workers and respect for their dignity is a permanent concern of this Organisation.

In conclusion, I should like to wish the Conference every success in its work and encourage the Director-General in his work to promote his policy.

Original – Hungarian: Mr. SIMSA (Employers' delegate, Hungary) – Please allow me to extend the congratulations of the Hungarian employers to the President and the Vice-Presidents upon their election to these important posts. The subject of the Director-General's Report is of great significance to Hungary. Application of international labour standards worked out by the ILO may help to mitigate the inevitable shocks of the process of transition.

The economic and social changes in Hungary produce transitional situations. Legislative regulations covering areas of labour are non-existent or cannot cope with new demands. The phenomenon of mass-unemployment is something new to us.

Work on legislation and methods to deal with it is still in progress.

It is also something new for a significant number of state-owned enterprises to have insolvency problems. A Bankruptcy Act was adopted recently. Under this Act, workers' claims are protected by a privilege that places them before all other creditors.

Another item on the agenda that may be of paramount importance to Hungary is that of structural adjustment and human resources development, this country being deeply engaged in the struggle for adjustment. And it is all the more significant given Hungary's relative lack of natural resources, and that intellectual capacity represents our most serious chance of emerging from our crisis. We need a workforce with better basic training, flexibility and mobility.

One positive result of government work is a check on inflation. The efforts made in this regard are obviously related to one part of the negative phenomena.

In word and principle, the Hungarian Government supports enterprises, expects them to boost the economy. But in practice the Government engages mainly in crisis management in an effort to reduce the budget deficit. So, enterprises are heavily burdened with taxes and contributions that deprive them of the resources needed for expansion, and thus a vicious circle begins.

At the same time, the significant resources at central Government's disposal are not used efficiently. While the level of taxation is exaggerated, that of social security is unsatisfactory.

Hungarian employers are conscious of their responsibility towards employees, those who lose their jobs, and towards society in general, and raise objections only when it is clear that newly introduced taxes and contributions only serve a short-term improvement in the government budget, but do not further the interests of employees and are a waste of our very limited resources.

An employment policy of clarity and foresight, and opportunities for job creation are needed. Jobs can only be created by enterprises – but only in a much better economic climate.

Employers and employees must have a say in the principles governing the distribution and utilisation of national income, if for no other reason than our experience and our immediate interest in the matter.

The "we know everything" and "we know better" mentality of the Government is bad policy, as shown nearly 50 years ago, and we should not fall into the same trap again.

It is absolutely essential that the Government increases its, and its institutions, efficiency. In this process, it should determine its role in the economy in social developments – a real division of labour between Government, citizens and economic agents should be created. Adequate distribution may be formed on the basis of such a division of labour.

Employers are viewing the contraction of industry and the related fall in GDP with distress. The Government was not successful in stimulating and making possible a change in production structure. This is mainly due to a restrictive monetary and fiscal policy. Branches of material production have great difficulties in finding a way our of their problems, with no adequate industrial and agricultural policy to help them – greater difficulty than the more flexible trade and services sectors. All this is of grave consequence as regards employment, given that the industry-heavy employment structure cannot be changed overnight.

Change cannot be brought about by a central adjustment strategy but by privatising economic property. Unfortunately, the pace of privatisation is slowed down considerably by political and practical factors, like fear – unjustified in our opinion – of a high proportion of foreign ownership, or the big appetite of the budget.

In Hungary, economic transition is helped along by several employers' organisations. Nine of them take part in conciliation at the national level.

The employers' movement is in too early a stage for a unified, fully representative, confederative organisation to have been created. We are aware that this must be our goal in the longer term, but this process cannot be forced. Only organic development can produce a stable, broad-based, united organisation.

Employers' organisations are unanimous in their views on the most important questions. They function without any serious conflict between them.

As a whole, our organisations represent State and private sectors, cooperatives, industry, agriculture and trade.

Among employers' organisations some are more representative than others.

It is to be seen from what I have said so far that the relationship between employers and Government is characterised by a continuous debate on the proportions of social contributions and on the distribution of the funds created from them. The debate may be centred on a draft legislative text or even the distribution of a specific amount in a fund.

Our main objections to the Government's conduct in the process of conciliation is their practice of starting discussions with an excessively rigid point of view, thus practically presenting the social partners with a take-it or leave-it situation. This results in badly thought-out legislation and regulation. Proof of this may be found in the frequent corrections and modifications, which also impair the legal stability of the conditions of enterprise.

The employers can only count on the Government to obtain the necessary information in order to prepare for the negotiations or to give access, in due time, to the bills to be discussed. It may not be deliberate, but cooperation is not flawless in this respect. These problems seriously question the level of professional reasoning and preparation. Therefore we try all ways and means to persuade the Government to abandon its paternalistic practices.

The relationship between employers and employees at national level negotiations is well balanced. Their respective points of view are close in most debated questions. The Government is the partner who represents the opposition to employers' and workers' aspirations in the majority of cases.

This is due, on one hand, to the high proportion of state property still in existence (around 80 per cent) and, on the other hand, to the fact that many questions under debate have to do with government expenditure and the magnitude thereof. Thus, even though the underlying reasons may differ, employers and workers stand side by side.

In spite of the difficult, and worsening, situation of workers, trade unions have, so far, in our opinion, demonstrated a down-to-earth, responsible attitude.

As you have seen, Hungarian conditions are not problem-free. We hope and we believe that this session of the Conference will give us experience and help in relieving our worries and improving our handling of the problems.

I hope all participants are able to draw on this session of the Conference for contributions to the success of their work.

Mr. KEARNEY (representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation) – May I first congratulate Mr Nascimento Rodrigues on his election as President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

On Plaza Mayor outside the Presidential Palace in Guatemala City, María Chávez suckles her month-old baby under a makeshift tented structure. Her other two young daughters sit beside her. The family is dignified in their poverty, but unbowed by the repression that had driven them and hundreds of other clothing, shoe and farmworkers to march to the city two months ago to focus attention on how democracy was failing them.

Illegally fired by their employers for belonging to a union, these workers have exhausted all means, including the courts, in attempting to secure their reinstatement. The employers concerned hold themselves above the law, beyond the courts and untouchable by the Government.

Successive Guatemalan administrations bear the blame. Years of inaction and continuing bureaucratic delays encourage abuses of workers' rights. The Labour Code provides for a decision on union registration within 60 days of application. Some women at the clothing company "Camisas Modernas" were still awaiting registration of their union a year after application. Some! Most had been harassed, intimidated, threatened or bribed out of their employment. Each day's delay heightened the pressure on these women, destroying their democratic rights.

Workers' democratic rights are denied in textile, clothing and leather workplaces throughout Central America. For example, in neighbouring El Salvador, two-thirds of the 3,500 workers fired by the ADOC shoe company in February are still jobless. Sacked for trying to form a union, their employer has now demanded that no other company in the country employ them. The Government turns a blind eye to their plight.

In these and other cases where Labour law is not enforced and where workers' rights are denied, there is no justice. And without justice there is no democracy.

Central to the problems facing workers in Guatemala, El Salvador and throughout Central America is the mushrooming of free trade zones in the region. Desperate to attract foreign investment and faced with fixed production costs other than labour, governments have abandoned sovereignty over many such zones, allowing labour legislation to be ignored, labour standards to be eroded and workers to be abused and denied their rights. Efforts to unionise are met with government disapproval, or worse, and with company threats to relocate free trade zones in neighbouring countries.

In reality, democracy is already dead in these and many of the other 500 zones world wide. Despite the democratisation process of the past few years, it is during these years that workers in the textile, clothing and leather sector have suffered the greatest abuses – greater than at any time in the past two decades.

In textiles, clothing and leather, the historic changes in Central and Eastern Europe were seen not as a victory for democracy but as a passport for managers to ride roughshod over their workforces, threaten governments and force a withdrawal of established workers' rights.

The lead players in this exercise have been multinational companies, particularly the new generation of such companies originating in Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong. These now operate in every continent and their inhuman treatment of their workers has already led to social unrest. Unchecked, their activities pose a threat to democracy in many countries. Repression and exploitation breed resentment and build social tension. Fragile democracies are vulnerable when frightened and threatened governments overreact in quelling such tensions while ignoring the causes in case the culprits quit the country.

Many of the companies now operating in the textile, clothing and leather sector are more powerful than the host governments, and when this power is abused – as it is being abused – democracy is subverted and threatened.

All this is occurring in spite of the more than 150 ILO Conventions, the countless Recommendations, a Code on Multinational Enterprises and other instruments. Enforcement of all of these is entirely based on persuasion. Has persuasion worked? Ask María Chávez. Ask her children. Ask her fellow workers in Guatemala, El Salvador and Central America, and heed their answers.

The international community has a responsibility to protect democracy and all its elements, including human and workers' rights. New mechanisms need to be established to aid this process. The International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation believes that since trade development has created many abuses of workers' rights, trading procedures should be used to restore, maintain and build workers' rights alongside a strengthening of developing economies. We strongly support the linking of trade and workers' rights through a social clause in all trade agreements, providing rewards and sanctions aimed at enforcing the principal ILO Conventions and establishing effective safeguards against exploitation and repression.

Claims that such mechanisms would be protectionist no longer hold water. Textile, clothing and leather jobs in developing countries are never going to relocate back to the industrialised world. The only loser will be governments, either too unwilling to respect basic human and workers' rights.

The ILO should take the lead in this, developing a dialogue with GATT and other relevant international agencies with the aim of securing mechanisms for the linkage of trade and workers' rights based on a system of awards and sanctions centred on the principal Conventions, which cover such areas as collective bargaining, the elimination of child labour and forced labour, and non-discrimination.

The application of these basic workers' rights cannot be negotiable. The ILO must be more interventionist in seeking to secure their implementation. Formal investigations of compliance should be undertaken in the same way that GATT examines the trade practices of member States. ILO technical assistance should focus more on aiding countries like Guatemala and El Salvador to guarantee workers' rights to their peoples.

The ILO should also seek and play a central role in the process of economic integration now under way around the world. All such integration agreements should include a social dimension, making provision for consultation with workers' representatives as they evolve. Democracy demands that economic integration should go hand in hand with social integration. The ILO needs to encourage governments, particularly at the regional level, to develop cooperation in their approach to issues such as free trade zones and cooperation in promoting the introduction of common legislation aimed at securing adherence to the main ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

Such cooperation would not only help to halt the present cut-throat competition on labour costs between developing countries, but would also secure greater rewards for involvement in export trade. Just how beneficial is El Salvador's current emphasis on exporting when the labour costs of producing a shirt there, which retails for US$55 in New York, is only 6 cents.

The impact of the growth of free trade zones on workers' rights must be addressed urgently. A wide-ranging examination of the operation of such zones should be undertaken by the ILO with the aim of establishing an internationally acceptable code of practice for the defence of workers' rights in existing zones.

The ILO must also expand its activities relating to the operations of multinational companies. The application of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy must be strengthened and enforced.

Finally, the ILO must recognise that the 1990s are not 1919. ILO structures and procedures need overhauling to tackle more effectively the growing abuse of workers' rights as a weapon in the battle for a share of world markets. Textile, clothing and leather workers across the world have difficulty in understanding how the ILO so frequently awards high office to representatives of governments whom workers hold responsible for their repression and exploitation.

The impressive march of democracy in the 1990s has freed millions from repression, but millions more, including huge numbers in the textile, clothing and leather sector, still await release. The democratic process must be further bolstered, with constant attention to the enhancement of workers' rights and the eradication of abuses. This can best be achieved by every government respecting and applying ILO standards, and the ILO must insist that they do.

María Chávez, at this moment sitting in the heat of Guatemala City, may not immediately benefit, but we must all ensure that her children never again face the fate of their mother. With work, freedom and justice, they may enjoy real democracy.

Mr. SHEHI (Government delegate, Albania) – It is a special pleasure for me to take part at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Speaking on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Albania at this meeting is a great responsibility because, for the first time, I am entitled to represent my country as Minister of Labour, Emigration, Social Development and Former Victimes of Political Persecution. I would like to thank you once again for the right you gave to Albania to rejoin the ILO after it left in 1967.

The year 1991 in Albania witnessed great political and social changes as in other Eastern and Central European countries. The move towards democracy reached a peak in March this year when the democratic forces overthrew once and for all communism in Albania. The creation of political, democratic institutions, the election of the Parliament by the free will of the people and a multi-party system are but an expression of the establishment of a democratic system in Albania. Political freedom will be the only guarantee towards a more advanced and modern society.

The new Government, being aware of the difficulties in solving the problems, has prepared and is putting into effect a programme for stabilising and restructuring the economy, with a view to settling a quickly as possible any ambiguities inherent in the political and economic changes of our society.

Today, Albania is presented as the country with the lowest income per capita in Europe. Its foregn debt has reached US$500 million and its internal budget deficit has reached 16 billion leks. Inflation is roughly 10 per cent every month. The number of unemployed is expected to reach 250,000. Foreign assistance is playing an important role. I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to thank the representatives of the European Community, the United States, Turkey and some other countries for everything they have done for Albania.

As I mentioned above, Albania, now that it is finally in the process of moving towards a market economy, has created the Ministry of Labour, Emigration, Social Development and Former Victims of Political Persecution an institution with which the European countries have been familiar for 100 years. This places a great responsibility on us because, on the one hand, we are very late in confronting these difficulties and, on the other hand, our structures must be built on a logical organisational basis.

It is clear that organisational restructuring will be carried out taking account of the current problems in this area. It should be based on qualitative work and be guided by the objectives of labour administration. Of course, these objectives will be determined with the help of foreign counsellors in our country in the form of technical assistance.

We are of the opinion that as regards the various forms of funding we must – aside from our internal funds – strive to secure financial aid from the International Monetary Fund, rhe World Bank, the International Labour Organisation and other intergovernmental bodies and neighbouring countries.

Nevertheless, the economic reform will be put into effect with all its inherent problems. The transfer of large enterprises to medium and small-sized enterprises, the privatisation of agriculture, employment, migration, the training of workers and the application of the tripartite principles are all problems we shall have to takle. In addition, we shall have to cope with the vast issue of social assistance.

The problems I mentioned in this discussion are very complex. They each have their own organisational, financial and social aspects and need to be dealt with in such a way as to avoid corruption. To this end, it is necessary to outline and review as soon as possible a number of draft laws, thus establishing an appropriate legal basis on the foundation of which all people may enjoy equal rights under the law and be free from discrimination on account of their political opinions. All this may be achieved by greatly relying on world experience in this area and on the financial budget possibilities of our State.

As the Director-General has already stressed in his Report it is the duty of the highest authority of the Organisation, the International Labour Conference, to decide how the International Labour Office may help its members overcome the obstacles confronting them. I appreciate these comments.

All this makes me believe that the isolation of Albania and its neglect of this participation are a thing of the past.

I am optimistic about the special and very positive role that the International Labour Office has undertaken to play in helping Albania come forward with definitive programmes.

Original – Russian: Mr. BADEI (Government delegate, Belarus) – Please allow me to associate myself with the congratulations extended to the President by other speakers on his election to this high post as leader of this Session of the International Labour Conference, and to express the deep satisfaction of my delegation with the organisation of the Conference's work. We have no doubt that under his guidance the Conference will take wise decisions in accordance with the noble aims of the ILO.

Our Republic has been a member of the ILO for nearly 40 years. Nevertheless, this session is a special one for us and for the other republics of the former Soviet Union. For the first time our delegation is representing a sovereign state, the Republic of Belarus. This is not just a change of name. It is truly a new State with its own principles, characteristics and ideology. The declaration of state sovereignty adopted by the Republic's Parliament gives the highest priority to values common to the whole of mankind, proclaims equality and the country's neutrality, and calls for integration into the world economy. It also stipulates the supremacy of international law.

My country has always shared the ideals of social justice and has tried to raise the standard of living of its people. But we now must recognise the fact that the ways and means chosen to achieve these noble aims were not the best, to put it mildly. And now, as we restructure the whole of the social and economic system, the international community's experience which the ILO has preserved is invaluable to us.

We have read the material provided by the International Labour Office for the 79th Session of the Conference with great attention and care, and I must say that in each of the reports we find very insightful thoughts, conclusions and proposals which can and should be used in our practical work. Clearly, this usefulness is the main virtue of the material presented to us and also the very sense of the work of the International Labour Office's experts. On behalf of the delegation of Belarus, I would like to express my gratitude to the Director-General and all the experts who participated in preparing the material for this session.

The statement is the Director-General's Report, Democratisation and the ILO, that "for the first time in many years the ILO is no longer the scene of ideological clashes and is able to offer to all its constituents the opportunity for close cooperation" is, I think, a conclusion that will be supported by all delegations. We are counting on cooperating with all our partners in just such a spirit.

The report quite clearly describes the situation in States adopting the transition to a market economy. It is indeed an extremely difficult situation. The organisational and structural rebuilding of the economy, the liberalisation of prices and the breakdown of numerous economic links built up over a period of many years have caused a drop in production, growing unemployment and a reduction in the population's standard of living.

The Republic's Government and Parliament are doing everything possible to mitigate the effects of the crisis and speed the introduction of a market economy. Legislative acts have been adopted which ensure the irreversible nature of these transformations. Equal rights have been extended to all forms of ownership, enterprises and housing have been privatised, and the conditions have been established for the development of entrepreneurial activities. The development of such activities is one of the key conditions for both structural change and job creation, and as such is also an important prerequisite for balancing the market, fighting inflation and increasing the population's income.

The Government is paying a great deal of attention to the question of labour relations. We are laying the foundation for social justice and democracy within the country. The basic legislative acts have already been adopted or drafted in order to regulate these matters. A law on minimum wages and state guarantees for labour remuneration has already gone into effect. It generally is in line with the proposed Convention on the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer. The draft law on labour protection takes into account the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). We are also basing other instruments being adopted by Parliament and the Government on international labour standards.

This is the main thrust of the improvement of our labour legislation. Before the end of the year we intend to bring before Parliament, the ratification of ten ILO Conventions. The necessary preparatory work has already been carried out, with the participation of ILO experts. I would like to express my profound gratitude to the International Labour Standards Department for the expert help it has given us.

Employment is occupying more and more of our attention. This is not just a question of the number of registered unemployed, since there are a number of allied issues. For exemple: the absence at a time of economic crisic of the means to create new jobs due to the need to make structural changes to the economy, the convertion and reduction of the armed forces, a disproportionate distribution of labour and capital, training and of course the absence of any experience in working under market conditions.

In order to provide effective solutions to all these problems the Government has approved a special employment programme which, provides for material support for the unemployed as well as job creation training and retraining for unemployed skilled workers and employers and employment services. More than one billion roubles will be allocated to the implementation of this programme.

However, this may not be enough since the symptoms of the economic crisis are spreading.

We are particularly concerned with the lack of training for workers in the employment service itself. Together with ILO experts we have prepared an excellent project, making it possible to upgrade the work of the employment service and resist the vocational training system. But because we do not have enough donors we are not yet able to implement this programme. Following the collapse of the USSR, developed countries ceased giving assistance to our republic for training workers in the employment service. So, I would call upon Ministers of Labour to look again at the possibility of collaborating in the aforementioned ILO project and assist us in training our workers.

We were very pleased to read in the Report of the Director-General that "the ILO will have to help these member States to formulate policy and to set up institutions for dealing with these problems and shortening this painful transitional period to a minimum".

We believe that this direction taken by the ILO must find its rightful place among the plans and budget of the Governing Body and the International Labour Office. Moreover, it also appears that the time has come to move away from one-off projects and measures, even though they are needed, and undertake a permanent programme of cooperation.

In conclusion, I would like to wish all the delegates and participants in this session every success and prosperity.

Original – French: Mrs. BANAKOYE (Government delegate, Niger) – It is for me a genuine pleasure to associate myself with the previous speakers in order to congratulate the President, in my own capacity and on behalf of my delegation, on his brillant election to the Chair of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The confidence shown in him by this august body bears testimony to his great personal and professional abilities and we are sure that under his guidance we will be successful in our work.

The questions put before the Conference for its consideration are very topical. I should like to congratulate the members of the Governing Body for having chosen such very relevant topics and I should also like to congratulate the Director-General of the ILO and his team for the very high quality of their work in analysing each of these topics.

Before I address the Report of the Director-General, I should like to set forth some of our views on the technical items placed upon the agenda of this session of the International Labour Conference.

The protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer was already discussed at the 78th Session. For us, during this session, it will be our responsibility to adopt texts which establish guarantees for the payment of wages. My country has already submitted its comments on the content of the texts submitted to the member States. These texts do not run counter to our legislation and national practice as regards the provisions set forth in Parts I and II of the proposed Convention, and my country favours the adoption of a legal instrument because of the difficulties of paying wages in times of economic crisis.

As regard the subject of the prevention of industrial disasters, this item has been submitted for first discussion by the Conference,. We welcome the choice of this topic at a time when our planet is threatened on all sides by this phenomenon which is now beyond human control. We support the Director-General in recognising that the profound anxiety felt by the public as a result of the industrial disasters which have occurred in recent years makes it necessary for us to embark upon constructive discussions on ways of coping at both the national and international levels, with this danger. Consequently, we support the Director-General's wish that we should implement effective measures to prevent industrial disasters and to protect the population and the environment as a whole. And we hope that the conclusions of this Session will enable us, along with the ILO, to introduce specific measures to combat these causes of these industrial catastrophes in the world.

There is another equally important item on our agenda, namely structural adjustment and human resources development. At this point in time this topic is central in the minds of our statesmen. Given the political and economic upheavals throughout the world, developing countries in general, and the countries of Africa in particular, are facing serious difficulties as regards their attitude to structural adjustment programmes and their social and other repercussions. We welcome the work done by the ILO to assist our countries in overcoming the difficulties connected with structural adjustment. We hope that the Report submitted by the Director-General for consideration by the Conference will enable this august body to analyse objectively constraints inherent in structural adjustment and to propose to our member States and to the ILO strategies which will be conducive to the implementation of genuine development policies.

The 79th Session also has before it the Director-General's Report on the Application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in South Africa. In spite of progress made by the Government of South African, the situation which continues to prevail raises a challenge to those peoples throughout the world who love peace and justice. The frequent and flagrant violation of human rights in this region of Africa are morally unacceptable. This is why the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid must lend increased vigour and vigilance to measures taken against apartheid.

I should like to congratulate the Director-General not only on the quality of his Report but also and above all on the very apt choice of topic, namely Democratisation and the ILO. For in recent years most of the African member States of this Organisation have embarked upon the path of the democratisation of public life.

It is commonplace to say that democracy is positive because it fulfils the deep aspirations towards freedom and social justice and can thus further the self-fulfilment of mankind and man's full participation in his own development.

But democracy is not necessarily synonomous with development. If it is to be so then democracy must be based upon an economy which if not strong is at least healthy, because man also needs economic and social welfare. Now in developing countries such as ours, which are concerned with the re-establishment of macroeconomic balance which is essential to our economic recovery, emerging democracies will be threatened if they are not supported by coherent investment and development programmes and educational and training measures.

You will, I am sure, understand how difficult it is for these States to steer their course when they want on the one hand to establish a genuine democracy and on the other hand to create economic and social conditions which will ensure their survival.

In this connection the ILO and other institutions should help our States which are in a democratic transition with the preparation and implementation of recovery programmes which do not have negative social repercussions. The countries of Northern Europe should, in a great upsurge of international solidarity, support the young democracies by assisting them in creating conditions conducive to their survival.

The ILO should in particular support our States by helping them to organise better the sectors which are the most sensitive in these critical times, especially the employment sector, by restructuring employment services, organising the informal sector which provides employment in urban and rural areas; promoting the employment of women who are very important, in particular in the rural context; holding seminars on carefully selected topics to help the social partners fulfil their rule in a multi-party democratic society, and finally, training labour administration officials.

After a courageous struggle by our people we have held our National Conference. We are currently in the full swing of transition. The National Conference has assigned to the transitional bodies, in particular to the Supreme Council of the Republic and to the Government, the mission of finding ways to meet the challenge facing our country. At the political level, essentially we must establish the conditions for the growth of democracy and a State based on the rule of law; restore the Republic and organise legislative and presidential elections. These goals are noble and will lead our country towards genuine democracy. But in fact the apprenticeship for democracy will be difficult. As the Director-General so rightly stated in his Report, the transition from authoritarianism to democracy is a perilous one. There is lack of security, a flouting of the authority of the State, a lack of commitment to work and a lack of respect for public affairs. This is the situation which threatens the current attitude towards democracy in our States.

In this context we feel that employers' and workers' organisations have an important role to play and that all governments which strive for the economic and social development of their nations should take this parameter into account and promote tripartism. The role of the ILO in the struggle for democracy is thus a crucial one.

I should not like to conclude my statement without welcoming the accession of new Members to our Organisation. This adds testimony, if such testimony were still needed, to the very high credibility of this specialised agency of the United Nations.

Mr. MOHAMED ABAS (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – On behalf of the Malaysian Members' delegation, it gives me great pleasure to address this 79th Session of the International Labour Organisation.

Among other things this Conference will discuss the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer the prevention of industrial disasters, adjustment and human resources development – along with the Director-General's Report Democratisation and the ILO, and the Director-General's Special Report on the application of the declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa.

These matters are timely and bear particular relevance to the changing situation – in the developing countries. I feel proud to be associated with this work.

As regards the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency on their employer, a proposal to this effect is being discussed at the National Labour Advisory Council in Malaysia. This proposal is in addition to the existing legislation concerning workers' protection. Upon implementation it will be a great relief – especially to non-unionised workers in Malaysia.

The prevention of industrial disasters is another area which is being seriously looked into. I recall a tragic local disaster which occured in a fireworks factory where many workers lost their lives. CUEPACS firmly believes that this is one area where the three partners can take a common stand. It also supported the setting up of an independent panel of enquiry to establish the causes of such disasters and recommend proposals on ways to avert them.

In this connection, the Government has approved the setting up of an institute known as the National Institute of Occupational Health and Safety which will encompass all aspects of the problem. Workers feel that this long awaited institute will hopefully address all shortcomings.

As regards adjustment and human resources development, I am pleased to state that this matter is being actively discussed by the National Labour Advisory Council. This Council is a joint responsibility of Government, employers and workers but the major contribution has been from the Government. Employers should also play an increasingly active role in human resources to develop countries, as highly trained workers are their main asset.

The existence of a tripartite system in Malaysia has helped us to resolve many problems. Nevertheless there are still unresolved issues due to certain circumstances. A case in point is the failure to set up a national union for electronic workers. The Malaysian Trades Union Congress stated that attempts by the electrical workers' union in the country to organise electronic workers under its fold had failed. Some time later, a group of electronic workers formed a committee for registering the proposed National Union of Electronic Workers. The all-MTUC efforts which backed the attempts of this committee were not successful. Meanwhile, some workers went on to form in-house unions.

What I would like to tell the Conference is that my Congress will explore whatever avenues we can with the social partners in the country with a view to solving the electronic workers' issue – bearing in mind our principle that workers enjoy the right to unions of their choice within the framework of the country's law.

There are three national centres in Malaysia, namely the Malaysan Trade Union Congress, CUEPACS, and the Malaysian Labour Organisation. The latter is a new entry in the field.

Given this situation, there are bound to be differences of opinions where political ideologies sometimes emerge. CUEPACS may differ in its style of approach on issues compared to the MTUC, but we have reached a consensus on our working relationship.

CUEPACS' main aim is to concern itself with workers' interests and progress, eradication of poverty, sound wages and terms and conditions of employment, workers' security and social progress. We, as a nation, are developing fast and do not wish to be left behind.

We have a tripartite body – the National Labour Advisory Council – which meets regularly and attains consensus on major issues among the three social partners, namely the Government, employers and the workers. One such consensus arrived at is the National Labour Policy.

In the public sector, the existing National Joint Council machinery is undergoing a reform – although it does not have collective bargaining rights which we are seeking to be restored. The existing machinery does provide the platform to discuss and we have solved a number of problems and issues by virtue of being a public sector trade union centre.

We would nevertheless prefer further improvement with an ultimate view to collective bargaining rights, and will continue to put forward our case.

Malaysia is continuing to undergo tremendous economic growth, and with this in mind, economic policies are being overhauled and restructured to suit changing needs. CUEPACS will attempt to ensure that the recently approved National Labour Policy will complement the other major policies, so that workers may be given a fair share of the economic cake. It is my belief and hope that the ILO will continue to provide technical assistance, so that workers in this region can continously update their knowledge, skills and performance.

Orginal – French: Mr. PEIRENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium) – The Director-General of the ILO, in his Report on Democratisation and the ILO, has highlighted the major challenge facing the modern world. Democracy is not a slogan, neither is it a concept that can be adapted to circumstances. The Director-General gave an unambiguous definition by linking political freedoms, guarantees of citizenship and equality of opportunity with rights to participate in power and economic responsibility.

He has – we would like to stress this particularly here – highlighted the intimate relationship, the inseparate nature of democracy and social justice.

We fully subscribe to this. Democracy is not a set of political laws or economic rules. We know this because we have, in our own lifetime, seen how democracy has fallen into the trap of demagogy and dictatorship and has been incapable of responding to social injustices such as unemployment, food shortages, the lack of health care, discrimination towards minorities and political exclusion.

Those who witnessed the rise of fascism know what I am talking about and are, together with us, concerned about seeing a revival of authoritarian tendencies within our own democratic societies.

Democracy and the market economy are not in themselves synonymous. Too often these different concepts are confused. The market economy must be organised in such a way that international labour standards are fully respected. Therefore we can only be shocked in this connection by the repeated official rejection by the Government of Malaysia to observe international standards in practice.

Social justice, therefore, remains for us a sine qua non, whether we are speaking about Central or Eastern Europe, Africa or Latin America, Asia or western societies. Democracy is not a title which you hold, neither is it a diploma which you obtain. The process of democratisation is an ongoing mission.

Before coming to the specific proposals concerning the ILO's activities, I would like to make a few preliminary comments.

The disappearance of ideologies or the aggressive trumpeting of one sole ideology can only, we feel, strengthen the need to give a specific form to the basic philosophy of the ILO, which is that of social justice, economic democracy, and to consolidate tripartism at all social and economic levels.

This tripartism is not a theory but a practice: to give a structure to society, there are several possible approaches.

First of all we have the hierarchical approach inherent to authoritarian regimes in which the State lays down the law, and on the other hand there is the individualised, contractual approach, which is the way which has been adopted by ultra-liberal States, with inevitable consequences of flagrant inequalities and an excess of conflicts between individuals.

Some countries, however, have been able to combine State rules and contractual relationships. In the socio-economic area this mixed system has led us to a symbiosis between the market economy, public intervention and representative trade unionism, a symbiosis which has made it possible to achieve a certain degree of prosperity, while limiting crises within the system. The ILO philosophy is therefore not a myth, but a possible and desirable practice.

However, a number of dangers and new challenges are arising. The construction of the single European market runs a risk of leading to a revival in all the countries concerned of authoritarism, because there is a lack of democratic control, and purely economic relations because of an absence of a social dimension. The internationalisation of the economy leads to similar effects at the global dimension: a loss of control by the main political and social actors, the challenging of national sovereignty, the instrumentalisation of democratic institutions. We also have to take into account the permanent effect of the external debt and structural adjustment plans.

In countries which are in the process of democratisation, governments tend to promote a liberal policy with authoritarian means, with the absence or real employers and without recognising trade unionism (trade unions are sometimes dealt with as a despised, or at least negligible, entity).

It is in this new context that we are now called upon to act in favour of a living, updated and credible tripartism.

I would like to highlight the priority necessity for new democracies to achieve a basic social pact which enshrines the principle of consultation, lays down the delineation between tripartism and bipartism, and guarantees the autonomy of the social partners.

We insist on this because almost everywhere where tripartism exists, a social pact has been concluded the starting point of social democracy. We also know that this cannot be decreed but establishing a model or a system of equitable relationships is the result of a great deal of effort, of a daily struggle and even today we must remain vigilant – we must seek ways to strengthen ourselves, to improve the model and to develop it further.

Now, I would like to come to the specific role and mission of the ILO.

We hope that the ILO will be able to provide itself with the resources, first of all and, in the light of what I have said, to strengthen its action in the field by means of technical cooperation to strengthen trade union and employers' organisations, which are the very basis for economic democracy. Secondly, to follow closely the development of reforms in central and Eastern Europe, as well as the policies of structural adjustment on the various continents with particular attention being paid to the informal sector. Thirdly, to promote tripartism and bipartism, in particular by means of technical cooperation. Fourthly, to study the effects of the internationalisation of the economic and financial apparatus and the creation of sovereign supranational areas.

We request in particular that the ILO play its role in forums directly linked with international programmes of restructurising and democratisation, in order to avoid a situation whereby tripartite and bipartite principles and institutions are emasculated progressively and thus voided of their content. We are thinking in particular of the IMF, the World Bank, the OECD and G-24, as well as regional supranational organisations such as the European Community and its international policies, such as the Lomé Convention.

With our statement we wanted to emphasise to what extent, in practice and not in theory, we need today the philosophy and the methodology of the ILO. We would like to see them strengthened, not just at the national level, in particular in the new democracies, but also vis-à-vis international relations and in the practices of international institutions. The internationalisation of our economic and political relations, on the one hand, and the North/South imbalance, on the other hand, oblige us to do this as a matter of urgency.

We know that we will have to fight to make sure that these orientations are actually put into practice and we would like to assure you of our commitment as a workers' organisation because, as the Director-General has said in his Report, it is our duty to carry out these activities with the ILO in order to establish social justice, which is the only basis for universal and lasting peace.

Original – Spanish: Mr. HUILCA TECSE (Workers' delegate, Peru) – I am pleased to transmit to you the greetings of the Peruvian workers and, in particular, of the General Confederation of Peruvian Workers, which recently, in its IXth National Congress, renewed its executives and redefined its activities in the light of the difficult situation in our country. We are suffering our worst economic, political and social crisis of this century, and the situation was made even worse by the coup d'état on 5 April, when the President of the Republic decided, with the support of the military commanders, to close the National Congress, reorganise the judicial power and take over the supervisory bodies of the State, leaving as the sole authority in the country his own individual mandate.

As a consequence of these events, which have had repercussions on international public opinion, there has been a new variation of dictatorship in Peru. The Head of State has not been overthrown, but he has overthrown all the other authorities elected by the people, and has proclaimed himself as the sole representative of the peoples' will, establishing a new authoritarian model in our country. This model differs from those seen in other countries in the region in the use of less violent methods. With it he intends to impose by force a neoliberal economic system which will ensure a capitalist solution to the crisis, brutally transferring the crisis onto the workers and the national majorities. The dictatorship is flying moralising flags to gain popular support and has decried the inefficiency of representative democracy – not to correct it, but to justify his unconstitutional act. Under pressure from the Organisation of American States (the OAS), and from internal democratic resistance, he has been forced to commit himself to re-establishing constitutionality through the convening of elections for 18 October of this year, and to elect a constituent congress, as a way of putting an end to what has turned out to be a dangerous political adventure.

Neither the workers not the country are convinced however, that the head of the de facto regime will fulfil the commitment made before national and world public opinion.

Events in Peru since July 1990 have given us reason to doubt the seriousness of the regime. This is why we are renewing our appeal to the international community to keep a close watch over what is happening in Peru.

The situation being as it is, we agree with the concern expressed by the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, when he submitted his Report to this assembly. Indeed, as he stresses, throughout the world there is tendency to democratisation and towards the confirmation of civil freedom, but this is eclipsed quite dangerously in Peru. As the Director-General says, the ILO should do everything in its power to safeguard democracy and therefore it must move from words to action, adopting specific measures which will help the Peruvian workers and the Peruvian people to free ourselves from the dictatorship which has been imposed upon us.

We would like to refer quite briefly to four topics which we deem to be of the most crucial importance: labour reforms; structural adjustment (which is being carried out); the relationship between the government and the trade unions; and the problem of human and trade union rights in Peru.

In 22 months of government, the regime of President Fujimori has carried out reforms within the labour relations system, distinguishing it from the one in force since 1990. This reform focuses basically on the area of individual labour relations, leaving collective relations pending. The main aspect of the reform thus initiated has considerably strengthened the employers' power. In a country which does not have a Labour Code the reform has replaced the obligation which promotes individual independence in labour relations with the concept of the so-called flexiblising of prevailing standards. A host of provisions have been introduced to enable the employers to alter internal labour regulations, to make employment contracts of restricted duration, and even to freely dismiss 5 per cent of fixed staff who work in factories every year. Within the scope of entrepreneurial activities, they have prevented adherence to collective Conventions that have already been signed, they have forbidden the holding of future negotiations, and they have imposed drastic wage ceilings. At the same time, the Government has ordered the dismissal of over 350,000 civil servants, including trade union leaders of all levels.

Recently the Government announced that it has a bill ready regarding collective bargaining which no one is familiar with. Existing labour and entrepreneurial organisations have not been consulted at all. It has also unveiled a so-called "strike law" which would abolish this universally recognised right, as well as legislation on the right to organise which, it appears, will deal a hard blow to trade unionism in Peru.

Structural adjustment has led to dangerous and humiliating measures for workers. The flexibilisation announced by the Government has reached the field of employment and the setting of wages. It has considerably reduced paid employment, both in the public and private sector, incrementing the power of the state enterprises, which represent 38 per cent of the national economy. The informal sector is growing uncontrollably and has absorbed 79 per cent of the Peruvian labour force. State workers' salaries have fallen to 10 per cent of what they received in 1979, thus swelling the ranks of the extremely poor. In 1986, 17 per cent of the households lived in poverty. This percentage grew to 44 per cent as a consequence of the first economic measures dictated by the Government in August 1990, and has now risen to 47 per cent, without any prospects that this percentage will decrease.

Government-trade union relations have seriously deteriorated. The Government systematically denigrates the trade union leaders, but also qualifies the workers as being privileged inasmuch as they have a job. All labour claims aimed at establishing a fundamentally democratic dialogue have been ignored by the authorities at all levels. The President has never met with the main trade union organisations to examine the problems of the country, or the situation of the workers, despite the constant requests for dialogue from all trade union organisations.

In the light of these serious problems I request that this Conference authorise the ILO to send representatives of the highest level to visit Peru and investigate the serious violations to freedom of association and to the rights of the workers which are taking place today, and which take the form, not only of economic measures which are greatly detrimental to our interests, but also of administrative and legal measures which run counter to rights and achievements we have fought so hard to secure.

One example alone illustrates this anti-union behaviour on the part of the Government. In 1945 textile workers signed a collective agreement establishing a system of automatic wage adjustments. However, a legislative decree supposedly invalidates this agreement, even though the agreement has the force of law. This violates our political Constitution, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court of Justice and international Conventions such as ILO Convention No. 98. Similar situations occur with other trade union organisations.

The workers, despite all these problems, and aware of our responsibilities, have in various forums put forward specific proposals to modernise the country and restructure the industrial sector. We are proposing a development project in favour of the great national majorities and an authentically democratic State, as an alternative to confrontation and the fatalistic view that the South is doomed to poverty.

In this light, the agenda of this Conference is of great importance. In fact, we cannot protect workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of their employer or ensure the prevention of industrial disasters, or guarantee the development of human resources without taking into account the situation of workers in the developing countries, particularly when the dominant sectors resort to violence to impose neo-liberal policies.

We are sure that the ILO shares this point of view.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.30 p.m.)

Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986: Ratification and Acceptance

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Before we start this morning's work, I should like to give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference, who will make an announcement concerning the ratification of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the ILO, 1986.

Original – French: The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I have pleasure in announcing that the Director-General of the International Labour Office has registered the ratification by Suriname of the Instrument for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, 1986. This brings the total number of ratifications and acceptances of the Instrument to 83.

Communication of the Officers of the Conference

Original – French: The PRESIDENT – I should now like to read you a communication from the Officers of the Conference.

The Conference has before it a resolution submitted by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, to be found in the Provisional Record No. 11, concerning the granting to Paraguay of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution.

Under paragraph 5 of article 19 of the Conference Standing Orders, a record vote must be taken on this resolution.

Following a question raised in the Finance Committee, the Officers of the Conference were asked whether, in order to save time, it would be appropriate to suspend this requirement under the terms of Article 76 of the Standing Orders.

Considering, on the one hand, that Paraguay lost its right to vote because of an accidental delay of a few days in the payment of a minimal outstanding balance of its current contributions, and that in these circumstances the restoration of its right to vote would seem to be non-controversial, and, on the other hand, that the suspension of the record vote would contribute to the orderly and expeditious functioning of the Conference, the Officers of the Conference concluded that such an action would meet the criteria laid down in article 76 of the Standing Orders. They consequently unanimously recommend to the Conference to suspend the application of paragraph 5 of Article 19 of the Standing Orders to this resolution, and to adopt this resolution by consensus or, if there is a request to this effect, by a vote by show of hands.

It is understood that steps will be taken to bring this recommendation to the attention of the Conference sufficiently in advance for it to be acted on, in accordance with article 76, when the vote on the resolution is taken, and for appropriate announcements to be made.

Fifth report of the Selection Committee: Submission and adoption

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The next item on the agenda is the fifth report of the Selection Committee, which appears in Provisional Record No. 6D.

This report concerns changes in the composition of the Committees. I put it to you for adoption.

If there are no objections, I will consider it as adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Request to the Presidency

Original – Portuguese: I give the floor to Mr. Al-Jassem, Employers' delegate of Kuwait.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-JASSEM (Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – I ask for your indulgence in taking the floor, but I would like to point out that the report of the Selection Committee, contained in Provisional Record No. 6D, omits a proposal I made yesterday within the Employers' group.

Tomorrow is the first day of Eid al-Adha. This is a very important Islamic holiday for a great number of the countries attending the Conference, in as much as the Islamic countries represent more than one-third of the ILO's member States. This is why I requested that the work of the Conference begin two hours later than usual tomorrow.

The Selection Committee examined this proposal, but unfortunately it took no decision. That is why I wish to repeat my proposal in the hope that it will be considered by the Officers of the Conference. I hope you will take account of the Islamic religion's practices, because we must go to the mosque at a particular hour in order to pray the customary prayer of Eid al-Adha.

It is only once every ten or 20 years that this holiday coincides with the Conference. The reason why the Selection Committee was unable to come to a decision is that some members said that they were unable to contact their respective groups. We do not in any way wish to hold up the work of the Conference; that is why we did not ask that Thursday be declared a holiday. We are only asking for a two-hour recess so that Muslims attending the Conference may go to the mosque and pray.

Original – Portuguese: – Sir, we take note of your request, but I would remind you that the Selection Committee did not adopt your proposal. Furthermore, the Officers unanimously considered that it would not be possible to accept your proposal because the Conference, as you know, has a very heavy workload. Therefore, on 11 June, the morning sitting will start at 10 a.m., as usual. I should also like to add that this decision taken by the Selection Committee is a final and not subject to appeal. The Officers, therefore, cannot reverse this decision.

REPORT OF THE STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the report of the Standing Orders Committee.

I give the floor to Mr. Beranek, Government adviser, Czechoslovakia, Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. BERANEK (Government adviser, Czechoslovakia; Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee) – Before I proceed to the report of the Standing Order Committee, please allow me, on behalf of the Committee, and on my own behalf as well, to extend our warmest congratulations to you, Mr. President, and to all the Officers of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference, on your election to these highly responsible and prestigious posts. We wish you all success.

I now have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Standing Orders Committee. The report was distributed in advance and is found in Provisional Record No. 9.

The business of the Standing Orders Committee consisted of draft amendments designed to introduce into the Conference Standing Orders the procedures which are in fact already being followed at the Conference this year to shorten and simplify the proceedings. These amendments were carefully prepared by the Governing Body and were unanimously approved by the Committee.

The amendment to Article 14, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders reduces the time-limit for speeches in plenary from 15 to ten minutes. This reduction was already made last year and again this year. It enjoyed general support, but under the present Standard Orders it required each time a special decision of the Conference on the proposal of the President who had to consult the Vice-Presidents. This amendment will therefore make such a special decision unnecessary in the future and the ten-minutes rule will become standard procedure.

The other amendments, namely to Articles 25, 72 and 75 of the Standing Orders, are designed to enable the Conference to start its work on the afternoon of the first day of the session instead of only on the second day. This was also already done this year, under the existing Standing Orders, and all who were present will recall that it led to a rather complicated and frustrating first morning. I can assure you that, once these amendments are adopted, this experience will be avoided because the Conference will be able to proceed straight to the appointment of the committees on the basis of the proposals of the groups without these having to go through the Selection Committee.

On the other hand, the Selection Committee will remain responsible – as provided for in the amended text of Article 9 – for proposing to the Conference changes in the composition of committees. It will also continue, under the specific provisions of Articles 5 and 6, to submit to the Conference nominations for the membership of the Credentials Committee and the Conference Drafting Committee.

A further amendment to Article 4, paragraph 2, is designed to eliminate the need for daily meetings of the Selection Committee by expressly empowering it to delegate in particular its routine functions to its officers. Although this is possible without amending the Standing Orders, it was felt desirable to provide for it expressly since it will be done more systematically and more frequently than in the past.

Finally, a technical addition is proposed to Article 72, paragraph 1, of the English version to bring it into line with the French and Spanish texts from which it differs. Allow me, as the chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to inform the plenary session that all the proposals before the Standing Orders Committee were approved unanimously. Such a result brings me a feeling of satisfaction.

It was an honour and a pleasure for me to chair the Committee but it was also an honour for my country, after nearly 20 years of participating in the work of the Conference, to be involved in this conference committee.

It seems that the process of further improvement and simplification of Conference procedures is not only desirable but also possible. If such efforts are well prepared, they should prove acceptable. This is very encouraging for the future.

Therefore, I would like to acknowledge the support and the spirit of cooperation of the two Vice-Chairmen, Miss Cornelia Hak from the Netherlands for the Employers' group, and Mr. Khurshid Ahmed from Pakistan for the Workers' group. I would also like to express my gratitude to the ILO Legal Adviser, Mr. Maupain, and his staff for all the preparative work and help.

I now have the duty and pleasure, also on behalf of the two Vice-Chairmen, of submitting the report of the Standing Orders Committee and the amendments to the ILO Standing Orders, and commending them to the Conference for adoption.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Thank you very much, Mr. Beranek, for submitting the report of the Standing Orders Committee. I would like to stress that all the proposed amendments were adopted unanimously by the Committee. Since there have been no requests for the floor to discuss this report, whose adoption implies the adoption of the amendments to the Standing Orders as proposed in paragraph 11 of the report, I will consider the report adopted if there are no objections.

(The report is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT - May I also consider that the amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference proposed in paragraph 11 regarding the amendments to Articles 4 (2), 9, 25, 72 (1) (which concerns only the English text), 72 (2), and 75 (2), are adopted?

(The amendments are adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – If there are no objections, I take it that the Conference also adopts the amendment proposed by the Committee of the first sentence of Article 14, paragraph 6, to read as follows: "Except with the special consent of the Conference no speech, whether by a delegate, a visiting minister or a representative of an international organisation, shall exceed 10 minutes exclusive of the time for translation."

(The amendment is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I would like to thank the Chairman and Reporter as well as the Vice-Chairmen of the Standing Orders Committee for the excellent work they have done.

Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion (cont.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Let us now move on to the next item on our agenda, which is the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. SIMONS (Minister for Labour, Suriname) – It is an honour for me to convey the greetings of the Surinamese people and Government to all delegates at the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We congratulate the President on his election and we are sure that under his skilful guidance the Conference will proceed to a successful conclusion.

The Report of the Director-General addresses the question of democratisation processes profoundly, and we must stress that these processes are not only shaping the face of the world politically but matter in the daily life of every individual, every worker and their organisations. The ILO has always been in the forefront of the movement for democracy and human rights, taking the position that both are essential for workers' and employers' organisations.

Allow me to draw attention to the sweeping changes in our world today, changes that have been triggered by astonishingly rapid changes in the technology mankind uses in pursuing its existence and curiosity. The technological revolution makes possible what only a few years ago seemed impossible and thrusts mankind constantly into new situations. We are confronted with new ethical questions in science and technology, and in the social and the political field. At the same time the old ethical questions are still relevant although they take on different forms and must be answered in different situations. The industrial revolution, which shook the world less than a century ago, can be regarded as a mere prologue to what is happening in our era.

The formation of large new blocks, as newly emerging economic and political entities, could be viewed simply as a new form of protectionism, but this is just an aspect of the immense concentration of economic potential of these integrated blocks, these immense markets of goods and capital.

The development of transport and communication techniques has produced the most dramatic changes in our way of life, intensifying the interaction between peoples and nations and drastically changing the formation and passing on of ideas. They have an enzymic effect on social, political and economic developments even in the most remote areas of the world.

All these changes have created a smaller world, easier to control and to manage. It is within this context that the need arises for new forms of economic and political management; the evidence of this is reflected in the sweeping changes in relations between peoples and nations that we experience today.

The main challenge of our times, maybe, lies in the peaceful and harmonious development of these relations and it will require democratic political systems in our countries which are rooted in truly democratic cultures, respect for human rights and a strong will to settle conflicts peacefully. The enhanced role of the United Nations in international relations underlies this development and undoubtedly we can also expect an intensified role for the ILO.

It is in this context that I would like to address two related subjects that are on the agenda of this Conference: the democratisation process and structural adjustment.

The Director-General has already stressed a number of important aspects of political developments in recent years and the importance of these developments for the functioning of workers' and employers' organisations, as well as the ILO itself.

I will resist the temptation to analyse these developments in detail and look for causes. A practical approach is to make use of one of the short moments in history in which people, and especially individuals at the centre of power, seem to have extremely converging views on how democracy should take shape and are looking for ways to settle differences and conflicts peacefully.

No matter how spectacular the political developments are, there seems an unmistakable link between the ongoing economic developments and these political processes.

Of course there is one self-evident link: especially autocratic regimes, regardless of their ideological orientation, adapt more slowly to the changing world and by failing to lead their people in these turbulent times they are confronted with massive democratic movements and a call for respect for human rights. These democratic movements are rooted in the struggle of economic and ethnic groups in our countries for progress and a better life.

It is here that the great danger for the young and fragile democracies lurks. The developments in the world economy which I referred to earlier create a very uneven development between regions, causing accumulation of wealth and progress in certain areas, and poverty and backwardness in others.

At the same time people are impatient, on the one hand as a result of prolonged stagnation or reduction in standards of living and on the other hand because of the very promises and ideals of democracy. So democracy is under pressure from the very same forces that brought it to the fore. Protecting fragile democracies, especially in our part of the world, will not only require firm political support from the international community, but also significant economic assistance.

In 1990, Suriname suffered a setback in the process of democratisation, but a major leap in this process was made earlier this year with the revision of the Constitution by the newly elected Parliament in such a way that all political authority of the armed forces was removed from the Constitution, thus strengthening the constitutional position of the Parliament and the Government. In the new Constitution the position of the democratically elected state organs is explicitly open, subject to the judgement of the electorate alone.

At this point it is relevant to draw attention to the question of structural adjustment. Almost five years have passed since the ILO held the high level meeting on employment and structural adjustment in Geneva. Since then there have been significant shifts in the positions taken on this subject by several international financial institutions. The ILO must be credited for being an important force in the process of bringing about this positive shift in policy.

Still, there is much concern among the developing countries about the effects of structural adjustment programmes. It has usually been the middle and lower income strata, wage and salary workers and other more vulnerable groups in society, who have paid an unequal share of the price of adjustment. Social and political unrest, instability and even setbacks in the democratisation process have been a direct result of some of these programmes which did not take into account the concrete political and social environment of the area where the programme was to be implemented.

Even with changed attitudes regarding the protection of the most vulnerable groups of society against the negative effects of structural adjustment programmes, it is easy to overestimate the pace at which the economy can be adjusted. To judge what reserves the lower and middle income groups still have left to pay for continued adjustment is very difficult. Among these lower and middle level income groups many workers have seen their lifetime's savings melt away in the crisis and adjustment of the eighties.

Of course, we in the developing world have no other choice but to adjust our economies in the face of the profound changes in the world economy mentioned above, although the best we can do is to keep up, because the dynamics of these changes are rooted in the rich, industrialised countries.

At the same time there is a pressing need for sound economic policies not only to follow basic economic principles but also to take into account the possibilities and impossibilities of the development prospects of our countries. In this context, we must mention the excellent work done by the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLA) in this field. We agree that the main challenge in the development strategy for the nineties lies in changing production patterns with equity. One of the main aspects of the integrated approach put forward by ECLA is the development of human resources, especially education. This aspect lies at the heart of the ILO and this reflects the importance of the ILO in the process of continued adjustment.

Suriname has involved the ILO in drawing up its structural adjustment programme which is to start within the coming months. We therefore support the strengthening of the ILO regional office for the Caribbean so as to intensify the activities of the ILO, especially with regard to structural adjustment and employment planning in the Caribbean region.

We are convinced that active assistance from the ILO, given its experience and authority, will be an invaluable support to the democratic process that is taking place in our country and also to our efforts to rehabilitate and restructure our economy in the face of recent national and international developments.

Mr. POPESCU (Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Romania) – On behalf of the Romanian delegation I would like to address my heartiest congratulations to the President on being elected to chair the proceedings of this Session of the Conference which by its topicality reveals once more the resources and dynamism of our Organisation.

I should tell you that it is the first time that I have participated in an International Labour Conference and that I have been impressed with the achievements of this Organisation over the past year which have been briefly covered in the Report of the Director-General on activities in 1991.

Allow me to express to the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to his staff, my greatest respect for the high quality of the documents presented, as well as for everything that has been undertaken in order to make this Session successful. I would also like to voice our gratitude for your solicitude, and for the support you have given to Romania over this period.

The Report that was presented as the basic material to be discussed deals with a topical issue of special significance to countries such as the one I am representing – Romania.

Despite all the good things we have done so far, chiefly relating to the basic juridical framework of democracy and economic reform, such as the Constitution, laws on labour relations, collective negotiations, collective bargaining, social security for employees, etc., we are currently facing a very difficult situation in Romania. The political transformation of our institutions, and the restructuring of the economy have lead to increasing poverty and a rise in inflation and unemployment rates. That is what everybody calls the social costs of the transition to a market economy.

We are aware that these difficulties are inevitable and that we may also expect some reactions of doubt about the very good things we have achieved. We should cooperate further with our social partners – employers and trade unions – but, as the Director-General rightly mentioned in his Report, there are many obstacles on the way towards tripartite relationships, in Romania too, such as an excessive fragmentation of trade unions and employers' organisations, the existence of a multitude of rival, insignificant and badly structured organisations which have not yet acquired the solid technical, economic and legal knowledge necessary for collective negotiations. Bipartite negotiations between employers and trade unions have not developed enough so far, particularly at the level of economic businesses and branches. This has caused difficulties in implementing some clauses negotiated at national or branch level. In addition, the economic difficulties are so great that there is too little room left within collective bargaining, especially with regard to the distributive function of bargaining in the field of wages.

The transition from totalitarianism to democracy has proved to be really hard and painful. The economic transition, being threatened with a deep crisis, has become as difficult as the political one. We face, at present, a critical situation, since we have to carry out economic reforms and structural adjustment programmes in conditions of recession, inflation and unemployment. Therefore, we salute the commitment included in the Report and in the ILO programme for the next biennium "to help these member States to formulate policy and to set up institutions for dealing with these problems and shortening this painful transitional period to a minimum".

We are mostly interested in the action the ILO will take in respect of the drawing up and implementation of some cooperative-type programmes mainly in rural areas. Our interest arises from the fact that in our country, under the totalitarian regime, there used to be "kolkhoz"-like cooperative farms which distorted the cooperative character of such businesses and compromised the very notion of cooperative. These "kolkhoz"-like cooperatives were dismantled after the December 1989 revolution and the land transferred to farmers' ownership.

At present, there is much reluctance to organise other cooperatives. But they could provide, during the transitional period, an effective means of turning to account local human and material resources and spurring competition.

The re-organisation of the market has, in our case, also led to the multiplication of intermediary agents, with no productive role but who appropriate an important share of added value, to the detriment of small-scale producers and consumers, in particular. The cooperative offer the advantage of eliminating these intermediary agents, improving production and increasing productivity and production capacity.

I consider that the strategy proposed for ILO activities in the next years is intelligent and complex hereby enabling this forum to grant faster and more efficient assistance to member States. This strategy is fully supported by the Romanian Government which is determined to contribute to its implementation, by granting logistical support to the settling of a team of experts in Bucharest, and working for the countries lying in the Balkans and on the coast of the Black Sea.

I would like to conclude by reasserting our thanks to the ILO Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for the cooperation we have had up till now. We hope, with good reason, that the ILO will support us in the future too, and will share with us its rich experience. In this way we will be able to work jointly in order to attain the aims of this Organisation.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express the gratitude of the Romanian Government to the representatives of the member States and of the international organisations which have shown understanding for the problems we have faced and I am calling upon them to develop bilateral and multilateral cooperation with Romania.

Mr. MUSANHANE (Employers' delegate, Mozambique) – I would like to add my voice to that of those who have congratulated the President on his election to the highest post at this Conference. Like them, I wish him every success in steering this Conference to a successful end.

The choice of democratisation and the ILO as the main topic of the Director-General's Report to this Conference is timely and necessary for socio-economic development, and particularly in the case of countries in Africa. The ILO bears responsibility to bring the message of democratisation, in whatever form possible, to the doorstep of all our countries.

In this connection, we, the employers in Mozambique, are very grateful to the ILO for its intense efforts to strengthen the Association of Mozambican Private Enterprise (AEPRIMO). For us, the high point of this action was a subregional seminar held recently in Maputo for employers organisations in Portuguese-speaking African countries. We are already witnessing the positive results of that seminar. We therefore appeal to the ILO to intensify its technical assistance to AEPRIMO as the best way of bringing democratisation into practice. In Mozambique, democratisation is pursued by means of economic liberalisation under the national economic recovery programme begun in 1987. The recovery programme is spearheaded by a structural adjustment strategy aimed at facilitating a positive transition from a centrally planned economy to a free market economy.

In an effort to install an environment in which democracy can thrive in Mozambique, the Constitution was revised in 1990 to make possible popular participation in decision-making. This was followed by the introduction of multipartism in the same year.

My employers' organisation, AEPRIMO, has taken advantage of these democratic changes to organise its members so that they can make an effective contribution to the development of our country. There are, however, some problems which require international involvement in order to be solved. The most urgent one is massive foreign investment. Now that peace is in sight in our country, I can assure foreign investors of the safety of their investments. Foreign assistance is also urgently required for the resettlement and rehabilitation of displaced persons and returnees from South Africa.

My employers' organisation is demonstrating that it is a formidable partner in development. It therefore calls on the ILO and other United Nations agencies to join hands with AEPRIMO and other foreign investors to make democratisation a workable proposition. Freedom of the individual is not enough. Freedom of the individual is only meaningful where the individual is self-supporting economically. This is the mission of AEPRIMO, whose membership is drawn from all the economic sectors of the country.

Mr. MILLER (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Czechoslovakia) – Allow me to express my congratulations to the President on his election to the chair of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish him every success in his work.

I am of the opinion that the theme which the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, chose for his Report to the delegates of this year's Session of the International Labour Conference is up to date and topical, and the approach he has chosen to present it deserves our admiration and thanks.

Let us consider the word "democracy". It is as old as human civilisation. We are using it on an everyday basis in different shapes, forms and cases. However, democracy has not been given to the human race once and for ever. During revolutionary times we used to write it on posters, and achieving democracy is considered the main objective of revolutions. In post-revolutionary, times, democracy might indeed have been achieved, but it has sometimes been somewhat brittle and we are trying hard to make it stronger, more solid and we wish to anchor it. We want to develop a democratic State and democratic society, or, in other words, we strive for the so-called "democratisation" of life. It has happened many times in history and it is still happening at the present in many places across the globe, including Central and Eastern Europe.

A great danger exists, however, that by permanent and thoughtless repeating of the word "democracy", by frequently attributing "democratic" to just about anything and by shielding ourselves with "democracy" on any occasion, the use of this expression will become commonplace and its protagonists will lose the feel for its real sense. The results of this can be seen when some measures can be labelled democratic, while they may in substance be anti-democratic. Unfortunately, such cases have been observed in the recent past.

Therefore, at such times it is not only useful but actually imperative to stop and do a bit of hard thinking and remind ourselves once again about the original and the appropriate meaning of the word "democracy". As a programme it means optimism, love, cordiality and trust.

It is, in my opinion, a vital ability to perceive things of perhaps even a negative nature and to cooperate to achieve a better tomorrow; it is a radical rejection of poisoned and unsatisfied indolence. Only then do such words like freedom, independence, equality and justice acquire their own sense and come to fruition. The rights of individuals can be exercised only in the society which acquires the absolute meaning of these words in everyday practice. More particularly, it is the right of each individual to participate in the management of public affairs because, as we all know, the word "democracy" has its origin in the Greek demokratia or government by the people.

As I have already said, although democracy has not been given to us once and forever, the people have always been moving towards it with a hope of better life. And when they have reached it they have always had to learn how to use it. Just as the developed nations of today had to learn democracy during past centuries, other nations want to learn its principles and indeed its meaning: the nations which have stepped on to the path of democratisation after the collapse of the totalitarian communist regimes.

However, as is apparent from the Director-General's Report, the full implementation of democracy and full respect of basic human rights do not really exist anywhere, so that democracy should be steadily learned in a smaller or larger extent by all people of our planet, and we should all seek its fulfilment.

The process of democratisation is closely linked with the change of an economic system. Both these processes are essentially complementary. Czechoslovakia has also commenced a journey of transition from a centrally planned economy to a free market system. The Director-General's Report quite accurately outlines the problems and shortcomings we are inevitably fighting against, whether at the Government, trade union or employer levels, as well as the changes which these three fundamental pillars of a democratic society are experiencing in their role, mutual relationships and position.

It is, however, important to realise one thing. At the very beginning of our transformation, the Government, trade unions and the newly developing social groups of employers realised the fact that hand in hand with the basic economic measures it is important to solve the pressing social problems of today, such as the drop in living standards, unemployment, poverty and, subsequently, to draft new principles of social policy, a policy which initiates and motivates each individual and social group to activity which will lead them to social independence and to the acceptance of the responsibility of individual citizen and social groups for their social situation. This policy should at the same time guarantee an adequate social protection to those who are in real need of it, namely the vulnerable groups of our society. This task must be dealt with at a time of an economic decline and a decrease in the standard of living. I have to admit that this process is a very complicated one if we have to respect all the assumptions of recently obtained freedom and democracy. Our goal, however, is the fundamental restructuring of the State and its political system, the introduction of an effective economic system which will assure the right of all to self-realisation and the satisfaction of needs for a decent standard of living at a steadily increasing pace, and the elimination of suffering and poverty.

We are fully aware of the fact that the creation of the necessary conditions to achieve these goals influences the relation between people and economic reform and alters their thinking and actions. In view of this, we are preparing each and every economic and social measure. I am pleased to say that the vast majority of citizens of Czechoslovakia support the practical steps of economic reform and accept them with a remarkable tolerance of their negative consequences. Nevertheless, in order to maintain internal stability and social peace we have to seek the practical implementation of several basic principles of democracy such as freedom and pluralism, make an effort to involve individuals in the decision-making process as regards questions which concern them, on the basis of social dialogue, negotiation and tripartism, which is a basic ingredient for the management of social relations and social dialogue in a democratic society which applies the principles of the market economy.

So, do we have the right to ask the question: Do we already have democracy? Not really. Democracy is not an objective. It is a tactic. It is a method. Is the revolution an ideal or just a method?

Dear friends, if among all political variations some actually have the character of an ideal or something desirable and permanent, it would perhaps be democracy. But it is an ideal, something which is not stocked in the house, but has to be delivered here at this time, tomorrow, in the life of future generations until the end of time.

It is up to ourselves how far we move towards this destination.

Original – Arabic: Mr. RASSOUL (Representative of the Arab Labour Organisation (ALO) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The theme of the Director-General's Report this year, Democratisation and the ILO, is appropriate, at a time when peoples throughout the world are viewing democracy as an ultimate aim to their aspirations – and as an instrument to fulfil their ambitions and hopes for the full exercise of their rights and freedoms.

It is hardly surprising that there is a growing interest in democracy among peoples of the earth at this historic juncture, which has witnessed the end of the Cold War and a period in which peoples are regaining their rights – free from fear, anxiety and hunger which poisoned the international climate after the Second World War.

It goes without saying that democracy and its political applications in the strict sense of the term, i.e. the government of people by the people, goes beyond the mandate of the International Labour Organisation. But from a wider social standpoint we are fully convinced that your Organisation is one of the international organisations most concerned by democracy and better equipped to protect and defend it; for indeed it represents the most prestigious world forum for protecting the principle of social justice.

We in the Arab Labour Organisation, which I am honoured to represent, have studied the Report of the Director-General which deals with a number of vital topics and reaches a certain number of conclusions and proposals – with which we agree to a great extent. This is only natural because the Arab Labour Organisation is unique from the standpoint of its tripartite structure, its social goals and activities and the quality of its action.

Within the Arab Labour Organisation, which is one of the pillars of joint Arab action, we believe in cooperation, constructive dialogue between the various constituents, categories and classes of society and more particularly the social partners who bear the responsibility for development, growth and participation in democracy from both an occupational and popular standpoint. At this point, it should be added that the Arab Labour Organisation's philosophy is mainly based on the principle of "shoura" (consultation), one of the cornerstones of the philosophy of Islamic Government throughout the centuries.

In this context, we fully support the principle of people's participation in development because it is the soundest basis for the success of any development programme. We see democracy as a solution to the marginalisation of vast sectors of the population and a way to hear their just concerns and to try to cope with them. It is also an aspect of collective solidarity and equality. Democracy is also a means by which we may attain development by the people for the people and the raising of living standards and productivity of the poorer sectors of the population – as well as a fairer and more equitable distribution of the fruits of growth.

On the basis of this premise, we try, within the tripartite structure of the Arab Labour Organisation, to strengthen by all possible means people democratic occupational institutions which constitute a pillar of tripartism. We believe that these institutions, wherever they might be, are a natural product of society based on its culture, values and aspirations, that they spring from real needs and are therefore able to take part in decision making.

With this in mind, we in the Arab Labour Organisation encourage a greater contribution by the social partners in various stages of development so as to strengthen democracy.

No-one disagrees that democracy as a moral and human concept is a symbol of development, even if it is applied in different ways. Logic tells us that the successful application of principles and rules inherent in democracy at the national level requires external conditions that are in many cases outside the realm of developing countries. In these countries the practice of democracy is directly affected by external factors, especially the international economy and economic and political decisions taken by a group or groups of countries intent on their own interests. It may therefore be said that the desired democracy is not national, local or confined to one region. But world peace is inextricably bound up with international democracy at economic, social and financial levels. The objective of one world based on solidarity remains a remote hope in the existing international economic order, where relations between North and South are scarcely characterised by equality, respect and common interest. In other words, the forces that govern the world economy may, because of their economic and financial strength, play an essential role in encouraging democracy when conditions for development are satisfied. And since we are speaking of democracy, we must pause to consider discrimination in employment and violations of basic rights committed throughout the world. These cases fly in the face of the most basic democratic concepts. The Director-General was wise to devote a large part of his Report to these violations. We note that there are still entities which exploit the riches of other peoples, depriving those subjected to their occupation and hegemony. Apartheid in South Africa, the military occupation and Israeli colonisation of occupied Palestine and other examples in our modern world constitute formidable barriers to the rights of people to enjoy democracy in the same way as other peoples in the world.

Democracy requires mutual respect between peoples in the exercise of basic rights and freedoms, such as the right to self-determination in a climate of peace and justice.

In all these cases, the International Labour Organisation remains the hope of weaker nations – and the more this Organisation responds to and tries to alleviate the sufferings of these nations, the more it will become a world organisation in applying these objectives and implementing its terms of reference.

However, singing the praises of democracy should not make us forget the suffering of migrant workers, irrespective of their nationality. They do not have the same stability and security as national workers despite their considerable contribution to national efforts.

In concluding, I believe it is my duty to mention the special relations we have with the International Labour Organisation as regards regional programmes and activities. For this, we need to ensure good coordination in order to increase the revenue of these programmes and activities. We look upon the ILO both at the headquarters and in the regional offices to increase cooperation, coordination and dialogue with the Arab Labour Organisation which always stands ready to cooperate with the ILO to obtain success in these bodies in the Arab region – taking into consideration Arab national interest and the welfare of workers in particular. In this context, I recall the resolution of the last Arab Labour Conference held in Tripoli, which demanded that the Arab region should be considered as a single geographical region in so far as technical activities and technical cooperation projects are concerned – in order to ensure coordination, complementarity and greater efficiency.

We believe that the headquarters of the regional office of the Arab countries should return to the Arab region, so that it might fully exercise its duties and responsibilities towards the various parties – based on the principle of decentralisation successfully applied by the ILO. I also hope that optimum use will be made of the credits earmarked to the programmes concerning the Arab countries. Finally, I hope that the number of officials in the regional office will be increased and that priority will be given to programmes that benefit first and foremost Arab citizens, after consulting with the parties concerned.

I wish the ILO every success in its work which, I hope, will lead to tangible results.

Mrs. GARZO (Workers' delegate, Hungary) – First of all, please allow me to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on having been elected President of this session of the International Labour Conference. I would also like to express our thanks for the expert and technical assistance we were given during the seminars that the ILO organised for us, mainly on the subjects of tripartism, collective bargaining and social security. The Hungarian workers greatly appreciate the help they received through these seminars. The ample experience of the ILO and its excellent lecturers combined to teach us the best methods and means to be used in training workers' representatives at different levels.

The Director-General's Report is highly informative and valuable. We studied the parts dealing with the countries in our region with special interest. The chapter of the Director-General's Report entitled "The transition towards the market economy" says "the (...) States that have initiated a process of transition to the free market economy are in a difficult situation at present. The political reform of institutions, the restructuring of the economy and the liberalisation of markets have, in the short term, brought increased poverty, owing to changes in the price structure, inflation, unemployment caused by the closure of unprofitable production units".

And the Workers' delegate should add to this statement: "most of the burden of this large-scale transition to the market economy is borne by the workers and, when assessing the difficulties and the different crisis phenomena resulting from the transition, it is the social impact on them that is of primary importance to us. The transition to the market economy should at the same time be a democratic process. But pauperisation, unemployment, a great mass of people having no prospects of livelihood, may all become weapons that can be turned against democracy".

A look at the position of the workers and their organisations in Hungary is enough to see that they are struggling under a double burden.

In Hungary an economic recession is going on, there is a fall in living standards, the position of the workers on the labour market has undergone a drastic change for the worse, the rate of unemployment is little short of 10 per cent and it shows a sharp upward tendency. I could continue to enumerate the factors of this situation but they are not unfamiliar to the developed industrial countries either. However, in the case of structural changes in Western countries there were not total changes of regime taking place at the same time as is the case in our country, and this fact makes restructuring even harder for us, increases the difficulties resulting from it and necessitates other specific solutions. It is all the more difficult because whilst in other parts of the world the workers' representatives were responsible for keeping the social consequences of restructuring at a tolerable level – not an easy task – in Hungary this task falls to organisations that, due to far-reaching changes in the whole system, are either just emerging or themselves are undergoing extensive changes.

An important development in this process is the agreement of the Hungarian trade unions to make a clean break by means of democratic inter-trade-union elections and to put an end to the era of the former regime. On the basis of these elections, our purpose is to divide up the trade union assets. Unfortunately, the Government does not understand the difference between a citizen and an employee and the fact that the trade union assets should be distributed among the trade unions only and not between the Government and unions. The ILO has always supported the democratic development of workers' organisations. We would like to request it to contribute also to this process by sending ILO observers to these elections.

Not only the workers' organisations but also tripartite relations lack firm roots in Hungary today. The social partners cannot yet manage their inevitable conflicts in a routine and civilised manner. The establishment of democratic tripartite institutions has begun. We have had a National Council for the Reconciliation of Interests for two years now and the setting up of medium-level tripartite institutions has also started. Since our partners' social receptivity is weak and the mix-up of roles resulting from property ownership also leaves its mark on the activity of the tripartite system, the Government mainly, and also the employers, tend to take advantage of the situation. Though privatisation has now started, the State is still by far the biggest owner, the biggest employer.

The Government neglects its duty to discuss issues concerning the restructuring of the economy, which necessarily involves the world of labour. Employers often fail to meet their obligations, thus endangering for instance the provisions for the unemployed, or social insurance.

In recent years the democratisation process has begun in a number of countries and regions all over the world, and the ILO has responded quickly to this challenge. It contributed to a great extent to the increase of the ILO's importance. I must, however, draw attention to fact, also pointed out in the Report, that the process of democratisation gives birth to new tensions and in Central Eastern Europe they do not get eased in the way seen in other regions of the world. Consequently the methods applied that have proven successful elsewhere are not necessarily suitable for us.

The link between the market economy and democracy mentioned above is sometimes displayed as highly specific interrelations in our country. We accept for instance the demand supported by the ILO and some other international organisations that the State should retreat from the economy. Nevertheless, we have to realise that the systems of distribution Hungary has inherited are such that a sudden retreat of the State would lead, as has already happened several times, to the collapse of malfunctioning, but all the same existing, social institutions, the replacement of which we have not had enough time and money for nor perhaps enough experience.

That is why we gladly welcome the ILO's intention to set up a Multidisciplinary Area Team in Budapest in the near future. We are convinced that direct experience and contacts will promote our joint efforts to help the region overcome the crisis and see the transition to a successful end. As individual elements in the crisis affected our region, which undoubtedly has a great many common features, the individual countries have their own various economic, political, ideological, social, ethnic, etc. crises, which makes their uniform management impossible for the region as a whole.

For this reason, while welcoming the establishment of the Team, we would like to present a request to the ILO for its cooperation with the countries concerned, from the time that the Team decides upon its various activities.

In the course of our cooperation with the ILO we have already obtained a great amount of knowledge relevant to the economic and democratic transition. It is extremely important for us that the introduction to tripartism programme be continued. In connection with this we have another request. We ask the ILO to help us to compile a document covering this subject matter, and also make it available in Hungarian so that the workers and their organisations may also become acquainted with it. I request you support in respect of all this.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. TIAGO GOMES (Employers' delegate, Angola) – Firstly I would like to express my warmest congratulations to the President on his election to his high office. I sincerely hope that he will be extremely successful in his work and that this work will be very fruitful.

This is the first time I have addressed this Conference and I would therefore apologise in advance for any shortcomings in my presentation.

My aim is to make a contribution, albeit a humble one, towards changing the status quo which exists between the different nations in the world, particularly as regards economic and labour relations, and to try to provide this international forum with a more active and participative role in this process and in the economic, physical and mental improvement of nations throughout the world.

The widening of the gap that separates the North and the South is something that causes me particular concern. This forum is a place where we frequently hear similar problems repeated with no forthcoming solutions. Frequently solutions are left to chance as the case with the unending requests for support from countries in the South.

The imbalance is flagrant between the North and the South and it is true that appeals made in this forum for multifaceted support for development and solidarity have been in vain, due to the lack of effeciency and effectiveness which prevails. In order to overcome this impasse, the requests for aid should take a different form, with more emphasis being placed on trade and assistance. All of you are aware of the economic interdependence which is essential to the survival of countries at present. No one should ignore that a substantial number of countries in the South are the granaries and suppliers of raw materials for North. The negative factor in this exchange is to be found in the economic disadvantages that result for the South, because of the unfair relations which govern trade between the North and the South. Any isolated attempt for a unilateral breakaway from such practices would result in severe pressure by the other parties and put the breakaway party in an untenable situation and leave it no other way out except to recede before the lobbies of technical transfer and know-how. History will have a boomerang effect.

We need to remember that all people and nations have the right to global progress. It is a fact that poverty leads to a drop in standards and morals. This is reality, whether it be in the United States, in the Philippines or in any other country of the world. The importance given to the manifestations of this human subworld varies from one country to another, and between the North and the South.

Every day foreign citizens die in foreign countries under strange circumstances. If this were to happen in Angola the whole world would consider these acts to be barbaric and savage. But if this were to happen in the West, however, it would justified by the advanced state of technological progress and consumerism. Both acts, whether they be in our country or in another, are the same in nature and are equally reprehensible because human life is of inestimable value wherever it may be.

The remedying of the imbalance between the North and the South requires investment in the South of the profits resulting from the trade between the two in order to encourage global, commercial, industrial and agricultural development, in the growth of the arts and literature, and the flourishing of the body and the minds of people in the developing countries. With the fall of socialism, the eyes of the Western Powers are now turned to countries which used to make up the Eastern European bloc, and this is jeopardising the aid programmes for Third World countries. All this is taking place so fast that catastrophic results are being precipitated. The good values of socialism, some of which are almost completely part and parcel of capitalism, continue to be valid. What we need to do is to study them from a different point of view in order to establish a new philosophical and political ethic. Angola is claiming the material and spiritual development of its people and has at its disposal enormous natural wealth in its soil, subsoil and continental shelf, which have been fueling the economies of the North to our own detriment. The riches or the wealth of Angola are unfortunately like a lifeless body of a native deer on which foreign wolves are feeding. This is not the manifestation of any type of xenophobia. I stress once again the need for economic interdependence and exchange between countries. You may not know this but in Angola, since the time of independence, a foreign labourer receives a monthly wage which is ten times higher to that of an Angolan doctor. Developed countries have done nothing to assist Angola in changing this situation by providing the Angolan citizen with a certificate of dignity through his work with regard to society and the world and based on the economic potential of our country.

Xenophobic demonstrations have taken place in France, Germany, Holland, England and in other so-called developed countries. They are particularly condemnable because of the violent nature which has characterised them. Angola has lived through a devastating civil war, which pillaged its human resources, its economic infrastructure, its fauna and its flora. This phenomenom of force majeur has recently been compounded by the drought which has extended through the whole African continent and requires urgent measures, not only to prevent the death through hunger of millions of people, but also to defend the ecosystem, which is constantly deteriorating.

This means that huge human, technical and financial resources are required, and for this we appeal to the goodwill of developed countries.

Angola is rapidly moving towards a capitalist economic system, and we are open to foreign investment in almost all areas of economic activity, in the form of direct or indirect investment by individual enterprises or in the form of joint ventures, with the guarantee that profits may be repatriated after taxes have been paid, and these taxes, I stress, are not high. We need to take up this challenge and invest.

I should not like to conclude my statement without referring to the role played by the previous President regarding the just struggle of peoples for self-determination, particularly the Timorese people, and the technical cooperation policy promoted by the ILO. I believe this forum should express its firm support for the cause of the South African people, the people of Slovakia and other people in the same plight.

I sincerely hope that action will take over from words in this forum and that technical cooperation become an effective, methodical, and balanced reality, we need to exorcise the spectre of a caste of privileged countries influential because of the lobbies of international officials who are recruited by methods and procedures which lack in transparency and equity. There is also a failure to disseminate information to all Members of the ILO with regard to the way in which vacancies on the executive bodies of the ILO are filled.

Finally I should like to add my voice to many others who have already expressed the need to introduce the Portuguese language into this forum as an official language. I hope that this proposal will not lie unattended in some office drawer and that a decision will be taken on this matter as soon as possible. I also think that the necessary conditions exist for the acceptance of the Portuguese language as an official language for the ILO. There is no longer the argument that there is a lack of orthographic consistency between the Portuguese-speaking countries; the Portuguese of Camões is spoken and understood both here and on the other side of the ocean and in all Portuguese-speaking countries.

It is now time to change the status quo. Mentalities must be changed and concessions must be made to provide greater development and solidarity between people and nations, with the due respect one for the other.

Mr KANERVA (Minister of Labour, Finland) – Allow me first of all to present my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference upon their election. I wish them every success in their high offices.

I would also like to congratulate the Director-General on his courage in choosing the theme for this year's Report. Democratisation and its relation to the labour market is not only a challenging subject to discuss, but also definitely one of the highest importance and topicality, as it links the drastic changes taking place in the world.

Let me express my pleasure and satisfaction at seeing so many new countries represented at this Conference. My special words of welcome go to the new States in the Baltic area, that is, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. Our geographic closeness and other affinity with them has already found its manifestation in the many forms of cooperation that have sprung up. Finland stands by its commitment to provide advice and assistance to them also in social and labour-related fields.

We can certainly all join the Director-General, when he states in his Report, and I quote: "the far-reaching reforms taking place in the world have their inspiration in the values and principles of… respect for fundamental human rights and social justice." The idea for democracy means that everyone should have a share in both political power and economic responsibilities. Political freedom can hardly exist without striking a balance between the encouragement of individual initiative and the assurance of equitable distribution of the fruits of economic activity.

Democracy means open power. The opposition is just as legitime as the majority that it may have to replace one day. In other words, democracy institutionalises the settlement of disputes by enlisting the participation of various interest groups in a constant and constructive negotiation process leading to solutions that are acceptable to all. Democracy can never stand still – it is a continuing process.

Tripartism is one of the indispensable elements of a democratic society. Labour law and labour relations, as well as the functioning of labour markets, are subjects for tripartite consultation, as are questions concerning economic and social planning.

As the Director-General underlines, participating in such consultations means not just presenting and defending one's position but also listening to the other side and honestly seeking solutions that do justice to the interests of all partners concerned.

The present international détente should provide the proper climate for furthering economic and social progress everywhere. The so-called "peace dividend" exists and should not be wasted. It would be most unfortunate if the opportunities to do so could not be seized fully. New tensions do exist, but they could be addressed primarily through affirmative political, economic and social action. These are trying times, especially for the handling of minority affairs.

The dramatic changes which have taken place in the east-west dimension have reverberations that are being sensed far beyond Europe. New political and economic directions are being sought worldwide. The path forward seems to be the correct one, but enormous challenges still lie ahead for the countries in transition. Their circumstances vary, and so do the results achieved so far. The interaction between the political, economic and social spheres is very delicate. How can they maintain the impetus of the reform while alleviating the resulting pain? How can they steer economic development without endangering the edifice of political achievements?

I believe that although the basic thrust of the reform movement must be maintained, patience is most advisable. Even in these modern times, with their emphasis on immediacy, historical proportions should still be borne in mind. Haste has never built successful societies.

Strengthened international cooperation on a global scale also is indispensable, and it should cover even new fields. It is evident that few important questions can remain which are of national concern only. Independence in the traditional sense often turns out to be a fallacy. Interaction is needed. But it can only be successful if overbearing attitudes are avoided and historical particularities are respected. In the new circumstances, with enlarged memberships in international organisations, common efforts call for a revision of the existing modes and institutional structures of intergovernmental cooperation.

This is especially true of the United Nations. Through reforms, the global body should be better able to meet challenges in an equitable way.

Finland, together with the other Nordic countries, has formulated a coherent set of proposals concerning the reform of the United Nations in the economic, social and humanitarian fields. The final report of the Nordic UN Project makes a number of recommendations to strengthen the normative role of the specialised agencies, to restore their analytical capacities, redress the balances between their regular budgets and extrabudgetary resources and redefine their role in providing technical assistance.

My Government is very pleased that the initial reception of such ideas has been very positive in the context of the International Labour Organisation as well. This makes us believe strongly that the implementation of these objectives would be in the interest not only of governments, but of all the constituents of the ILO.

On this occasion, I would like to emphasise especially the importance of the analytical capacity of the ILO.

I wholly agree with the Director-General, who has pointed out that the ILO should be able to propagate its values and its ideas. An enormous research and policy-making effort is currently being undertaken in various international organisations, with their respective emphases. Yet it seems that no other body is studying the fields covered by the ILO, such as the interrelationship between democracy, the pursuit of economic and social goals and respect for human rights. I believe that it would be in the genuine tripartite interest, and in keeping with the Nordic UN Project, if the ILO's capacity to compete in the international marketplace of ideas were enhanced. Our joint organisation should be allowed to grow into a true centre of excellence.

Original – Turkish: Mr. MOGULTAY (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Turkey) – From the outset, I would like to extend my warm congratulation to the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. Needless to say, my congratulations also go to the other Officers. It is my sincere conviction that under your able guidance this session will be successful.

It gives me a profound pleasure to compliment the Director-General on the comprehensive and lucid report he presented to the Conference. Democratisation and the ILO is a timely and appropriate topic, which provides a good basis for the ongoing discussions.

As reflected in the Report, respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms, the reinforcement of tripartism and collective bargaining systems, and encouragement of a market economy with its social dimension, constitute three indispensable elements for democratisation, together with political and social stability.

As we are all aware, the movement towards democracy has gained momentum since 1975 with the collapse of the authoritarian regimes in southern Europe. This movement then spread to Latin America and finally embraced Central and Eastern Europe, Africa and later on Central Asia.

As never before in history, the collapse of an empire without a war and bloodshed has paved the way to the emergence of new independent countries in Eastern Europe, the Caucasus and Central Asia, not only with new hopes, aspirations and expectations, but also with problems and uncertainties. Desirous of integrating with the international community, these countries chose democracy and the market economy to promote prosperity. An important threat to democracy in the transition process is the possibility of economic failure. In order to prevent such an eventuality and achieve stability in the newly independent countries in transition, their current efforts to integrate with the world have to be stepped up and assisted.

As of 1920, Turkey adopted republican secularism and started its march towards democracy as a way of life. Over the past decades, there have been significant achievements in firmly establishing democratic institutions. As elsewhere, so in Turkey there are steps yet to be taken with a view to further reinforcing democracy in all fields. Aware of this need, the coalition Government formed in November 1991 included among its programme objectives the necessary constitutional and legislative amendments and administrative arrangements for achieving a freer, more participatory and more fully democratic regime based on human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Shortly after it came to power, our Government established two ministries for this purpose, one responsible for human rights and the other for women's problems. It also intitiated procedures to amend the provisions of the Constitution with a view to democratising it.

Having already ratified six out of the 12 ILO Conventions on basic human rights and tripartite consultation, the Government has initiated legislative procedures to ratify four more Conventions, namely Nos. 87, 135, 144 and 151.

Turkey has been implementing the market economy model for some time, and the Government has been striving to meet the challenges of the transition process by giving due consideration, in a multifaceted manner, to the social aspect of the restructuring of the economy. Within this framework, studies are being conducted to include unemployment insurance in the Turkish social security system. Furthermore, in close collaboration and consultation with the social partners, the Government has drafted a Bill ensuring employment security for workers against unjust dismissals. In the same vein, a Bill has been submitted to Parliament to ensure ratificiation concerning the Termination of Employment of Convention, 1982 (No. 158), at the initiative of the employers.

Turkey, with its dynamic economy, democratic regime and secular system, stands as an island of stability at the junction of such diverse regions as the Balkans, the Black Sea, the Caucasus, Central Asia, the Middle East and the Mediterranean. Located right in the middle of a region where new political developments are taking place, Turkey's international and regional responsibilities have increased, owing also to its historical, geographical, cultural and linguistic ties.

In order for the new republics of the Caucasus and Central Asia to be able to open up to the world both economically and politically, effective international cooperation seems indispensable. Turkey stands ready to assume these responsibilities to the best of its abilities and to contribute not only to intra-regional but also to inter-regional cooperation.

While opening its doors to new States currently experiencing economic and social changes of a radical nature, I believe there are services of utmost importance which the ILO could offer within the scope of its competence and expertise. I am also of the opinion that there is and will be a need for highly qualified senior experts to analyse the difficulties of transition from centrally planned socio-economic systems to democratic and free market economies and to help work out the necessary ways and means. In order to provide these services in the localities where they are needed, some necessary adjustments should be made in the structure of the ILO.

I take this opportunity to point out that Turkish experience in the fields of democracy, secularism and the market economy might be of some relevance in supporting newly independent countries' efforts to open up to the world.

On the other hand, technical assistance should be geared in a multidisciplinary approach to local and regional needs as proposed by Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General, and welcomed by the Governing Body. It is my conviction that it would be appropriate if the ILO offices in the region were strengthened so as to make it possible to render the aforementioned services efficiently. The Turkish Government is ready to extend every assistance in this respect.

Now I would like to dwell briefly upon the issues of international migration. In the final analysis, the main cause of migration is the wide differences in development levels between regions or countries. However, in the last decade, Turkey has witnessed massive waves of migration originating from the political and military developments in the region. As a result, hundreds of thousands of people entered Turkey and a large number of them stayed on even after the emergency situations in their own countries ended.

Containment of massive migration arising from political instability and economic failure could only be achieved through international cooperation. Therefore, it becomes crucial to eliminate all impediments to the growth of trade and production within a free market environment all over the world, to support democratisation efforts morally and materially, and to promote the peaceful resolution of conflicts internationally. This is what we understand by the new world order.

Finally, I wish briefly to touch upon the question of racism in some developed countries. In 1991, the upsurge of racist incidents reached levels unprecedented since the Second World War. Turkish workers and their families in Western Europe are one of the main targets of racial violence and harassment. There were many casualties and much material damage. The size of the electorate with racist tendencies has grown considerably, as seen in the elections and public opinion polls. Therefore, we commend as opportune the selection of the Report of the Director-General on racism. We expect the countries concerned to take effective measures against racism. We are ready to cooperate internationally to combat racist violence.

In concluding, I would like to reiterate my wish for the success of this session of the Conference and my belief in the continuation of the ILO's contribution to universal peace and democracy.

Original - Spanish: Mr. BUSTOS HUERTA (Workers' delegate, Chile) - On behalf of Chilean Workers, I would like to convey to you our warmest greetings and also express our determination to analyse, with the help of this session of the Conference, ways in which a solution can be found for the urgent problems facing workers throughout the world and particularly in our underdeveloped economies.

I would like to single out two specific questions: The Report of Director-General and adjustment and its impact on workers. Both these aspects are linked to the problems of Chile and Latin America.

Very appropriately, The Director-General highlights the major democratic evolutions that have affected a large majority of countries, and their governments choice of a free market economy. This applies almost one hundred per cent to our Latin American continent and particularly to Chile. Those who have been fighting under extremely difficult conditions against the Chilean military dictatorship have made a contribution to democracy and therefore we greatly appreciate this development but we also share the preoccupation expressed by the Director-General whereby it is necessary to find a machinery which ensures that political democracy goes hand-in-hand with economic development and social justice. We as Chilean workers value democracy and we beleive in economic freedom as a driving-force in development. Still, we believe that the primitive and savage neoliberalism we see developing in our continent constitutes a threat to democracy, since outstanding and social and economic problems drive people to violence and Poster disbelief in democracy which is the only alternative in the new world order.

This is why the neoliberalist model lends itself to criticism. Therefore, it is necessary to ensure that social actors are able to participate to a greater extend in all aspects of society, and to give the State a greater role and more responsibility in protecting the poorest strata of our society, which in our country means almost 40 per cent of the population. We should promote the development of social dialogue through equitable procedures which respect the parties involved and we should also develop tripartism and bipartism as concrete expression of dialogue and negotiation.

The transformations that have taken place during the last 20 years not only had a direct impact on technology, on science and the economy but also on workers, who need to adapt their trade unions organisations to the new challenges. They need to modernise, become more technical in their approach, and they need also protection on both an individual and collective basis. In this regard the ILO has a major role to play as generator of social policies helping to preserve and increase democracy, thus promoting the values of freedom and human dignity which are laid down in its Constitution and thus ensure that the principles found in the Declaration of Philadelphia become a reality. We need international legal instruments to promote social justice and equality. We must develop a responsible policy of technical and international cooperation through programmes which really help to strengthen trade union organisations and ensure that these policies are implemented in each of our countries. In this regard, the workers of Chile appreciate the efficient cooperation which recently initiated with the ILO in the field of education, and we hope that this cooperation will continue and expand to permanent training and advisory programmes.

The trade union movement in Chile would like to make use of this international arena to emphasise once again the very specific character and originality of the ILO as a tripartite body and as an institution which is based in terms of authority on permanent dialogue between governments, employers and workers. We hope that the ILO will continue to further its effort and increase its standard-setting activity especially in those countries which have opted in favour of democracy and in which primitive neo-liberalism is being applied. We as Chilean workers are concerned by the situation in Latin America and would like the ILO to keep an eye on developments. But we are also concerned by the situation of those countries in Eastern Europe which have now gained access to democracy. Though in the past we supported those countries which cried out for freedom, today we should insist that the ILO continues to be vigilant to ensure that international Conventions are observed, ratified, and are applied, in order to silence the claims of some sectors which favour the dismantling of all standards in order to eliminate "inflexibility" which paralyses the so-called free market.

These reflections are very closely linked with the subject of adjustment and its impact on workers.

Adjustment policies with regard to the international crisis led in Latin America, and in particular Chile, to a decline in the labour market. We saw a decline in the quality of jobs created, an increase in the informal sector, an initial increase in unemployment and a general decline in wages. As a result, we can see that the cost of adjustment was absorbed almost entirely by the workers. The high cost they paid, known as "social debt", led to a huge increase in poverty and a fall in living conditions of those who belonged to the middle income groups.

In so far as there is no compensation for these sectors, any future development strategy entails a serious risk of leading to conflict, which could jeopardise democracy. What we need is great equity in industrial relations and measured State intervention in some areas such as training, vocational training and retraining. These aspects could also contribute to economic and social progress and must, before they are implemented, be fully discussed with all those involved, particularly the workers. Adjustment is universally associated with modernity. We as workers, are the first to applaude modernity. We are aware that while we have been fighting against dictatorship, Chile, and the rest of the world have been undergoing radical changes. The transformations born of science and technology have altered production relationships. We must revise fundamentally our trade union movement.

But we cannot accept so-called progress which only benefits a few, whilst generating poverty for the majority. For us progress and modernity must mean a better quality of life and an equitable distribution of the fruits of development.

It is rather difficult to speak of modernity when we are witnessing fires, explosions, the release of poisonous gases – the results of a breakdown in the functioning of industry or public works which lead to the death of citizens or workers as happened recently in Mexico. The ILO must draw up international legislation which upholds exceedingly stringent standards.

Finally, I would like to express our gratitude to the ILO for the efficient assistance extended to us through the labour education project which is expected to run for three years and for the Director-Generals' constant concern, as shown when he visited our country recently.

The Workers' Education Branch and the Director-General of the ILO deserve the gratitude of all Chilean workers.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CEVALLOS GOMEZ (Employers' delegate, Mexico) – Since the mid-1980s Mexico's transformation has been a constant and far-reaching process.

Having decided to put an end to four decades of protectionism to join the GATT and to open up our economy and international trade, we have moved from inward-looking development to outward-looking development, with an emphasis on exports. By rescaling the size and role of the State, we undertook a major process of privatisation of production, and it became apparent that the engine of the economy is the entrepreneurial capacity of individuals.

Our modernisation is moving ahead in the form of successive measures for change which gradually affect the most varied fields. Our Government achieved a satisfactory renegotiation of Mexico's foreign debt. The relations between church, the State and society have entered into a new stage. Agriculture is seeking to boost productivity. The state of the treasury is being improved. The ongoing struggle against inflation is meeting with success. Negotiation and agreement between economic agents is aimed at more healthy forms of development planning. The design of new industrial policies enables our enterprises to participate actively in the world economy and today we are on the verge of establishing a free trade zone with the United States and Canada.

If today we can say that Mexico has changed, it is because its transformation is based on carefully weighed premises. Firstly, we stress economic and social realism. Development is not possible without having the necessary values and determination to recognise and measure the real state of society and the economy. The first premise has been accepted by the International Labour Organisation, by its Governing Body and its Director-General, to the great satisfaction of Mexican employers, as the starting point for the modernisation of our Organisation to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

The second premise concerns a realistic assessment of the actual situation, which is characterised by the globalisation and liberalisation of world markets and by renewed forms of communication, all of which makes it impossible to continue with closed national or regional economies. Trade liberalisation in most of the world has brought both advantages and disadvantages. The advantages include the expansion of the supply of services and goods with better prices for the consumer. The disadvantages include the closure of enterprises because of their unprofitability or their inability to modernise. this area offers an interesting opportunity for action by the ILO: its technical cooperation programmes should offer support for industrial reconversion and training in new activities. It is important to understand that industrialisation represents the ideal means of augmenting and promoting the creation of jobs, and therefore, that the disappearance of enterprises is directly related with the problem of unemployment and underemployment.

Thirdly, a fundamental premise in the development of Mexico is the reliance on concertation to bring about a meeting of minds in joint decision – making processes which involve all productive agents. This has been a vital principle in our transformation because the active and deliberate participation of society is essential for overall development. As in the ILO, tripartism is a means for securing the agreement of all participants and serves as a guarantee for present and future development.

For the past four and a half years Mexican society has been discussing and agreeing on important social, economic and political decisions, seeking not only to correct existing structures, but also to define what kind of country we want to build for the future. At the moment, jointly, we have emphatically agreed on three essential aspects of the logic of a modern development philosophy – the environment, education and productivity. We are convinced that a nation is prosperous and competitive when it respects the natural environment, when it is enlightened and cultivated, and when it is trained, efficient and productive.

In caring for and respecting our mineral, plant and animal resources, we recognise that we are responsible for the common heritage of the world society. Our very lives and livelihoods depend on the natural balance. To conquer ignorance and overcome underdevelopment and to strengthen human capital at all levels and to ensure social mobility, requires an efficient education system in terms of quantity and quality, useful and productive schooling which trains children and young people to face up to the new decisions and the new realities. This is the best way forward for our country. Productivity plays a crucial role in promoting social creativity. In public or private enterprise, this means producing more and better products, to make rational use of available resources, to participate more actively in innovation and technological advances, to open up channels for the whole working population and enable it to participate increasingly in economic activity and in its fruits. The environment, education and productivity are today priority matters for Mexico's effective participation in the body of developed nations.

As a corollary of these premises we can say that given the undeniable fact of economic liberalisation in the greater part of the world, and in Mexico, many countries will speed up their problem-solving activities, within a framework of a free market and under the guidance of States which are both high-minded and modern, by basing their development on programmes to enhance productivity and quality.

The notable work of the ILO relates to all these matters; we therefore believe that the process of change initiated by the Director-General must be continued. For this reason we support all the programmes that will enable our Organisation to strengthen its role and presence in the contemporary world. In conclusion, on behalf of the employers of Mexico, I want to congratulate the President on his election and offer him our wishes for success in guiding the work of this Conference in the hope that it will contribute to better working, social and economic conditions throughout the world.

Original – Chinese: Mr. PAN (Employers' delegate, China) – First of all, please allow me, on behalf of the Chinese business leaders, to extend our warm congratulations on his election to the President of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. My warm congratulations also extend to the elected Vice-Presidents. I am confident that under their leadership this Session will be very successful.

The main theme of the Director-General's Report for this Session is democratisation and the role of ILO in that process. We, the Chinese business leaders, attach great importance to this topic. In China, a country with a long history and an Asian culture, the idea of a people-based philosophy is at least 2200 years older than Abraham Lincoln's famous saying "of the people, by the people, for the people" which was made in 1863. Therefore we consider all these ideas and philosophies to be the common property and wealth of the whole of mankind.

We, the Chinese employers, have a deep understanding of democracy and social justice. No enterprise can become competitive without depending on the initative of all its employees, nor can a company exist or develop without sticking to the principle of justice.

We, the Chinese business leaders, always consider employees as the mainstay and core of a company. We pay great care and great attention to the employees' daily life and their occupational safety, and we make every effort to provide opportunities for them in education and on-the-job training, in order to improve their quality. At the same time, in Chinese enterprises, trade unions or workers' congresses have been established in which trade unionists can fully express various opinions and put forward their suggestions to improve the work and operation of the enterprises. And their democratic rights are also fully respected.

At the same time, if you want to ensure that an enterprise grows and prospers, efforts must be made to improve its management on the basis of democracy and justice.

In the early years after the Second World War, Western scholars and business leaders considered management a universally applicable rule just like natural science and technology. Some people nowadays see democracy and democratisation in somewhat the same way. If some advanced management technique cannot be used successfully in some regions, in their point of view the problem is not in the management style or the technique itself, but in the region, which should be changed to adapt to the proper style of management. However, after the 1960s, with the emergence and development of multinational companies, they began to realise that their previous understanding of management style was not adequate. Management has two aspects. The first related to productivity management techniques and methods can be applied all over the world, in the same way as natural sciences and technology. But management has second characteristic, related to those who manage, namely people-orientation in management. Here it is necessary to take careful account of the different social, economic, political, cultural, educational and psychological backgrounds of managers. Therefore, the success and effectiveness of a style of management depends on the different situations and cultural traditions of different countries and peoples.

Any competent employer, if he is really to catch up with the global tendency of our time in taking part in international competition, should be well aware that world competition in the 1990s is inseparable from the application of different management styles in different cultural circumstances. Therefore, it is crucial to develop cross-cultural managers to run companies in regions with different cultures.

It is, however, regrettable to note that some people's understanding of the concept of democracy remains the out-of-date concept of the management style of several decades ago, which considered that there existed some panacea, or some single universal rule to be observed everywhere in the world. They still do not realise that as the style of management differs with different cultural backgrounds and social values, the understanding, concept and expression of democracy also differ with different cultural and traditional conditions.

We, the Chinese business leaders, shall devote our efforts to developing our economy. We shall learn all we can from other countries of the world, adopting ways and methods which are suitable to us and promote our productivity, strengthen our economic power and improve our people's living standards. We shall try our best to update our economy to a new level every few years. We are willing to establish friendly ties with all our counterparts in the business circles of the world to increase mutual understanding, promote cooperation and to contribute to mutual economic growth and world peace.

Mr. REPCHA (Employers' delegate, Latvia) – Allow me to present my congratulations to the President and the Vice-Presidents of the Conference on their election. I wish them every success in their high offices.

We, the delegation of the Latvian Republic, very much appreciate the possibility to participate in the work of the International Labour Organisation after 52 years of interruption due to the occupation of our country. I am sure that the existence and solidity not only of the democratic States but also of the democratic international organisations, such as the United Nations and the ILO, were the main reasons for the victory of democracy in the territory of the former Soviet Union and for the re-establishment of Latvian independence and that of the other Baltic States, Estonia and Lithuania.

We are now in a transition period, moving to a free market economy where private initiative and private enterprise will dominate. You all know, dear fellow delegates, that the economic situation in Central and Eastern Europe in this transition period is quite difficult, and many theoretical and scientific inquiries have been made about the causes for this situation and possible remedies. The general direction out of this crisis is very clear. It consists of broad economic reforms with the privatisation of state enterprises as their central point. Practically all political forces in Latvia agree on this concept. We can say that it is the consensus of all Latvian society for rapid changes towards a market economy to take place, at least in theory. Nevertheless, the pace of reforms is very slow and economic difficulties are becoming more serious every day. What are the causes for this situation? They are many. But let me try to explain only two very general causes, which in my opinion are responsible for the all too slow pace of economic reform.

The first one is this: our people have lived all their life in a socialist, centrally planned economic system, without the possibility of any private initiative and with a high degree of state intervention in the affairs of all individuals. On the one hand, people's behaviour was directly controlled by the Communist Party. On the other hand, the people were deprived of all responsibility, not only for the economic and cultural growth of their State but also for their own well-being.

And now we have many people who helped to bring about the victory of democracy, but who do not understand the nature of the economic reforms; many of them are afraid of economic changes towards a market economy. It is very hard for them to accept the transfer of responsibility for their own lives away from the State onto themselves and therefore, unfortunately, we find that socialist thinking still dominates our society. I am sure that the first step towards a market economy must be a revolution in the minds of the people. People must understand that neither the Governments nor Parliament will bring prosperity but only their own creative private initiative and actions. These can and must be a strong foundation for their own well-being and the well-being of the State.

What are the new political forces which can bring about a new kind of thinking in the political life of Latvia? With this question, I come to the second general obstacle which hampers our movements towards a market economy. In the last 52 years of communist rule, we have had no real political system because the only political system was the Communist Party itself. The consequences of such a terrible history are that the political system at present is still very underdeveloped, we have only three big political movements: Popular Front, National Independence Movement and the Congress of Citizens, which mainly represent the interests of the national survival of the Latvian people. But we have no strong, large political parties or groups which represent the political and, maybe more essential, the economic interest of the various social strata of Latvian society. In this situation, aggravated by the economic crisis, the role of employers' and workers' organisations becomes very important, indeed an essential element not only of labour relations but of the whole political system. This is to say that these organisations must have, and now indeed have, big political components in their functions. It is my opinion that strong, national employers' and workers' organisations can be a constructive, stabilising element in our society, with great influence, perhaps greater at the moment, than that of the political movements and parties, on the decision-making process of Parliament and the Government, and can help changes occur more quickly.

We now see it as our task to shape our Latvian employers' organisation into a strong and effective force in the field of labour relations and of political events. For this purpose, the experience and potential of such a world-famous Organisation as the ILO is essential and very important to us. We are very thankful for the possibility to take part in the work of the ILO, in order to help our country become democratic and prosperous and so to promote democracy and prosperity throughout the world.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. DE JESUS (Government delegate, Angola) – It is always a great honour to take part in the highest assembly of the member States of the International Labour Organisation, which this year is in its 79th Session.

To Mr. Henrique Nascimento Rodrigues I should like to extend a sincere and friendly greeting on behalf of my Government, my delegation and myself on his election to serve as President of this session. I am fully convinced that with his abilities and skills, which all of us are very familiar with, the session this year will be a total success. I should also like to extend my congratulations to the other Officers and to the secretariat.

I should like to say how very pleased I am at the timely, relevant and topical subject that the Director-General has chosen this year for our discussion, at a time when countries around the world are moving towards democratisation. My Government would like to congratulate the Director-General.

I should like to say that Angola, through its delegation, has come in force to reaffirm its appreciation to the ILO for the attention that it gave to its political and social programmes, and basically to demonstrate its full devotion towards general democratisation and, in particular, labour democratisation.

At the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference I spoke about the political, economic and social reforms under way in my country which have been further facilitated by the context established by the Peace Agreements to promote democracy, social justice and a State of law.

I am very pleased that the democratisation processes, linked to the economic stabilisation and structural adjustment programmes, fall within the mandate of the ILO. At the same time the ILO is proceeding in a very practical, just and efficient way concerning the processes taking place in each country. I feel that the ILO is certainly on the right road.

Instinctively, people wish to live in democracy and social justice, and now this murmur has become a deafening roar that can no longer be suppressed. Major bulwarks of totalitarianism and racism around the world are giving way to democracy. The dialogue of the deaf has become social cooperation, and situations of economic, political and social intransigence and narrow-mindedness are now giving way to rotation of political power, national reconciliation and a market economy.

The process of reform initiated in my country under the Government economic and financial programme, which has received an important thrust following the end of the civil war and the building of peace will experience a historic moment with the multi-party legislative and presidential elections in September of this year. To this end, we will continue to create institutional and legal conditions so that all citizens can participate actively. Whatever the cost, my Government, working together with the political partners, is determined to carry out the historic mission of enabling its people to elect its parliamentary representatives and the President of Angola in a climate of peace and national reconciliation. Moreover, my Government is also convinced that given the economic programme underway during this time of transition, we run real and palpable social and political risks. There are growing problems in the area of prices, unemployment, instability of employment, the lack of social infrastructure for the protection of the most vulnerable social sectors in the urban, suburban and rural areas. To counteract the situation, we have introduced a political and social programme on health, employment, social security, vocational training and rehabilitation. We feel that the results of this will be attained within the short and medium term.

I should like to affirm that only way for Angola to achieve overall economic balance is through the growth and development that Angola requires and that the Government together with the social partners will continue to assume the risks involved, convinced that only in this way can we bring about a brighter and more humane future.

The question in our eyes is whether or not the ILO has a contribution to make to member States. The Director-General has said that it does, taking into account the traditional attributions to the ILO and the many expectations of its member States. Facilitating and supporting the transition to democracy, helping governments to establish conditions for the future development of their countries, providing assistance in building more open and just societies are all tasks which fall well within the ILO mandate. The ILO has always given priority to programmes which support democratisation, fight against poverty and protect the workers. This support will create many tasks for the Ministries of Labour, for the workers' and the employers' organisations. In this way, it is clear the Ministries of Labour will be required to assume greater political responsibility as part of the Government. Thus the ILO, through effective and adequate programmes, will need to strengthen the institutional and functional ability of these bodies so that they can play a greater role in economic and social policies.

It is therefore essential for the ILO to review its working methods and modernise its structure and transfer to the peripheral bodies greater decision-making power in order to rationalise the use of available human resources and time and provide technical cooperation in line with the urgent needs of the processes underway in the member States. In order to ensure the proper development of and participation in this programme, the ILO needs to encourage the cooperation of the member States in a fruitful and permanent dialogue in which everyone feels co-responsible for the success of the programme dialogue. Those Members which have some experience with democratisation and structural adjustment should play a larger role. In this sense, the role and the presence of the Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa should not be undervalued because they have gained specific experience as a result of the opening up their labour administrations towards the future.

In line with the contribution that I have just mentioned, the ILO is preparing for the signing of an agreement with Portugal which, through a specific project, will establish in the Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa effective information systems on labour markets as a basis for decision-making in employment and human resources development policies and as a means for strengthening the ability of institutions responsible for the management of labour markets and facilitating the exchange of experience on appropriate ways and means of ensuring better the management of employment market.

I should like to welcome and stress the importance of this timely and promising initiative by the ILO and the Portuguese Government. I am sure that great success will be achieved in each of the Portuguese-speaking countries of Africa.

At this session, we have had the great privilege of the visit of President Chiluba of the Republic of Zambia, from whom we heard very wise suggestions and comments concerning the role of the ILO in today's world. The presence of the President of Zambia among us is a recognition of the ILO's very important role in the workers' struggle, in building democracy and social justice in Africa.

Finally, I cannot hide my delight at the fact that this time the Portuguese language has been used directly in some of the meetings of various bodies. But what we would like to see is for Portuguese to be used without any restrictions, as is the case with the other working languages at the Conference sessions. As in the case of UNESCO, Angola is ready to work with the ILO and with the other Portuguese-speaking countries so that Portuguese can be a permanent working instruments of the ILO.

Original – French: Mr. GEORGET (Employers' delegate, Niger) – First of all, I would like to extend to the President my heartfelt congratulations on the occasion of his brilliant and unanimous election to preside over of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish to congratulate distinguished Vice-Presidents as well. I would also like to congratulate the Director-General, the Secretary of this Conference, for the choice of topic for his Report, Democratisation and the ILO. Democratisation is indeed an urgent and topical issue which provides food for thought for our Organisation. We have to reflect on this topic because the concept of democratisation is intricately linked with that of social justice. It is thus at the very heart of the mission, activities and concerns of the ILO.

In short, we believe that democracy is necessary for social justice, but also that social justice is necessary for democracy.

Democracy is necessary for social justice because without democracy there can be no strong, free and independant workers' and employers' organisations to represent faithfully the aspirations of their constituents. Only through the work and activities of these free organisations is it possible to take into account the needs of both. In this context, the international labour standards which have been established patiently over the years since the establishment of the ILO are of particular importance and value. We consider them an irreplaceable set of models which we should seek to achieve. Obviously, we should not harbour any illusions. The precarious economic situation, which is often tragic in our developing countries and particularly in our region just south of the Sahara, a region afflicted with severe drought, does not permit us to ratify nor to implement all of these Conventions.

I welcome the various contributions made by the Employers' group in the Governing Body of the ILO. This group has called for the old Conventions to be reviewed in order to make them more suitable and adaptable to the economic realities of our developing countries. I am convinced, however, that those Conventions which are of basic fundamental importance and which relate to human rights such as freedom of association, the fight against discrimination and the abolition of forced labour can and should be implemented all over the world. This is where employers' and workers' organisations can use their creative forces in order to overcome the major scourges of our planet, such as poverty, and thus participate fully and responsibly in the economic and social development of our countries.

However, social justice is also necessary for democracy. How can one refer to democracy if the population is unable to meet its essential needs in terms of health, vocational training and education? This is why the industrialised countries and the international financial institutions must understand that the process of democratisation which is now under way in a number of countries, especially in Africa, which is of course something we welcome, will bear fruit and be successful only if the economic and financial policy vis-à-vis the Third World takes into account the real needs of our countries and their legitimate aspirations, and only there is a substantial increase in the level of assistance. Their assistance must be stepped up significantly and, of course, the ILO because of its traditions, and its sphere of competence, has a decisive role to play in this regard. The efforts undertaken by the ILO as regards technical cooperation must thus be continued and developed, especially in those countries which have been hardest hit by drought and other natural disasters. The promotion of employment, labour administration, industrial medicine, and social security should be given priority so that our States can finally enjoy harmonious development. We stake high hopes on the International Labour Organisation, as we trust that it will help us to overcome the arduous and painful problems before us. Among ILO activities which we must be the crowning glory and we hope the Turin Centre that it will receive the financing it needs to develop further. I would not wish to conclude my speech without mentioning how much we appreciated the activities undertaken by the Assistant Director-General responsible for ILO activities in Africa, and the Bureau for Employers' Activities, which are supplemented and supported on a permanent basis by the International Labour Organisation, despite its limited financial resources.

For reasons of time, I cannot, unfortunately, list all the other departments but through them I wish to extend my greetings to the Director-General for the particular attention he has constantly paid to our routine concerns.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I have a request for the exercise of the right of reply. I would like to remind you of the rules governing the exercise of the right of reply. These rules were stated on the first day of this session and I would like to remind you of what was read out in French at that time.

(The President continues in French.)

The reply should refer only to the point in question. It should be brief and should not exceed two or three minutes. In no case should it be used to make a further speech. Lastly, it should be worded in proper parliamentary language. To avoid endless discussions, the President will have the right to refuse replies to a reply.

(The President continues in Portuguese.)

I give the floor to Mr. Sawhney, Government delegate of India, to reply on a statement made by Mr. Ijaz-Ul-Haq, Minister of Labour of Pakistan.

Mr. SAWHNEY (Government delegate, India) – My delegation has asked for the floor to set the record straight in regard to the attempt by the distinguished delegate of Pakistan yesterday to misuse this august forum to level baseless charges against my country.

Reference by the leader of the Pakistan delegation to the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir is a blatant attempt at interference in the internal affairs of India and deserves nothing less than contemptuous rejection. The State of Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of India and no amount of Pakistani propaganda on the virtues of democracy and self-determination, which are sadly missing in Pakistan itself, can change this fact.

More pertinently, Pakistan's preaching of human rights appears particularly hollow at a time when the Government of Pakistan is guilty of torturing and abusing a senior Indian diplomat, in violation not only of the Vienna Convention but of all norms of civilised behaviour.

Normal life in the State of Jammu and Kashmir has been disturbed mainly due to terrorism and subversion in the State instigated and supported by Pakistan. Terrorist groups armed and trained externally are the prime agents of terror unleashed against innocent civilians. This does not speak…

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – I would ask you please to confine your reply to the subject of the speech to which you were replying. You have concluded the time allotted for your reply.

(The Conference adjourned at 1.15 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – We shall continue the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. EURNEKIAN (Employers' delegate, Argentina) – It is a great honour and pleasure for me to address this assembly as a delegate for the employers of my country, Argentina.

I should like to congratulate the President, as other speakers have done, on his appointment and the responsibility this implies.

Over the years I have read many Reports by the Directors-General and I must say that they have all been outstanding.

But what we have here is something more than a Report: it is a study of the circumstances being experienced by many countries as they move towards democracy, and of the sacrifices they are having to make to adjust to the profound economic changes inherent in this transition.

I therefore congratulate the Director-General most particularly on his wise and timely views and on the possibilities that they raise for discussion.

From a study of the process of democratisation emerges the need to consolidate political systems based on pluralism and respect for the rule of law.

Democracy finds its natural correlative in formulas where political freedom is reconciled with economic freedom.

Thus, private enterprise appears as a way of achieving intellectual and material fulfilment for human beings with the purposes of social justice.

It should be pointed out in harmony that both in the field of political literature, as well as in institutional practice, we have often found these concepts and values to be viewed separately.

This reflection is particularly apposite in the case of Latin America.

We are firmly convinced that these values cannot be found other than within the framework of a political/economic context of the kind I have mentioned.

We no longer have illusions, nobody can possibly believe that where arbitrariness is combined with nepotism or corruption, isolation with procrastination, there can be equity or justice.

We have carefully read the reflections of the Director-General and we note with satisfaction that they reflect our own ideas.

In the speeches that the Argentine employers have made at this Conference over the past decade we have set forth our ideas in this respect.

We have also emphasised the role of intermediary organisations and the need for them to participate in democracies.

Likewise, we have favoured social dialogue, that is, any way of helping to harmonise interests during the process of structural changes. This is because the result of decades of lost freedom is that our administration is backward and unfeasible and our technology is obsolete.

As a consequence of this, adjustment has been inevitable, but not adjustment for adjustment's sake; adjustment to bring about structural change with a view to progress and development.

We cannot conceive of political freedom without political parties and the free play of democratic institutions. We cannot conceive of economic freedom without a strong and active manager and workers who take part in the dialogue involved in production which is the synthesis of common effort of workers and enterprise. We cannot conceive of freedom in the community without strong intermediary organisations, in tune with their times.

For all these reasons we agree with the Director-General when he says in his Report that we must set forth unswervingly along the path of change, and that the best guarantee of the stability and success of the transition is for all parties to participate equally.

Today, we see an ILO which does not hand out easy cures and detach itself from reality. We see an ILO which is part of that reality, one which is committed to our efforts and is striving to support these processes. We recall the commitment entered into by the ILO when it recognised, at the Regional Conference in Montreal in 1986, as well as at successive high level meetings in 1987, the need for structural adjustments. If we had not felt the wind of change we would have felt that we were being ingored.

Nevertheless there is still more to be done. We want an ILO that is commited to putting an end to the violation of fundamental rights, such as forced labour by prisoners and young persons, and discrimination, an ILO that will guarantee that such aberrations, which moreover make competition very difficult for countries which do stick to their obligations, will cease. In spite of this, we are surprised and concerned to find that, in some cases, these countries are still treated very favourably. We must fight in all areas to put an end to this injustice and unfair competition.

Our country is undergoing far-reaching changes. Structural measures are being taken for the time to turn around decline, our procrastination and our isolation. We realise that there is still a great deal that needs to be done and we agree with the Government and society as a whole on the need to make these changes. This is an unprecedented and historic opportunity for us, based on principles of economic openness, globalisation, and on the shaping and modernising of the State. We are in the best possible position to implement these changes because we have the two necessary variables – political and economic stability.

Nevertheless, the Argentine economy needs to evolve simultaneously with changes in production structures taking place at the international level, especially in the countries that are engaged in unfair competition with us. This is why the State should lay down planning policies and strategies to speed up the changes to the system of production and to society as a whole, under the impetus of new technologies. We do not need grants or subsidies, but instead policies to support the genuine development of industry and its technology and capacity for steady growth, in accordance with rules which have applied constructively in other countries, so that there is genuine competition at the international level.

The international market is neither perfect nor transparent. On the contrary, excessive regulation is exercised by some developed countries, which in certain cases turns into real aggression against countries which are relatively less developed. At a press conference prior to the Annual Assembly of the IMF and the World Bank, Michel Camdessus said that 45 developing nations were unilaterally opening up their markets without having similar reciprocity from the industrialised countries. Furthermore, he exhorted the industrialised countries to consider the efforts of the developing countries as equal to their own and to open their markets to imported products.

World trade supposedly deregulated in this manner is a concept that has become outdated, no country can permit itself the luxury of accepting such conditions. This economic pseudo-liberalism has proved contagious and affected the Western World just as Marxism in the thirties seduced the intelligentsia, and it has become a new spectre for economists and ideologists. In this world where markets are being polarised into large groups of countries within regions and form blocs, multilateral and bilateral agreements are being broken so that these groups can manage their business unilaterally. This undermines our international competitiveness.

Those who have direct access to industries using high technology, where comparative advantage disappears, only achieve this access by force of will and with the necessary means. This is why we must create the necessary conditions for fair competition with strong investment and modernisation policies so that our country can develop its own capacity for economic growth. We must defend our markets, our consumers, our integration, both with regard to regional and social matters.

Argentinian industrialists do not need the stimulus of unfair competition, subsidies and dumping to be competitive and efficient. Never in modern history has there been a nation, that claims to be a great nation, that has not had to defend its markets, and this is the only path that we can take to make our country live up to its title of a developed country.

In 1776 at the time of Adam Smith and David Ricardo extremely high tariffs were established in England and these lasted until 1846 when England achieved supremacy in world trade. The United States had very high tariffs from the end of the Civil War until shortly before the First World War. So my question is, why not us? What are we waiting for? Surely this is the most appropriate moment in our history to apply tariffs? Argentina only has one path that it can choose and that is the path of rapid industrial change.

We also feel that fundamental changes are necessary in the fields of labour and social security and these reforms have to cover the whole of the law governing individual and collective employment relationships to ensure effective flexibility that, far from being harmful to workers, will create more job opportunities for them and give them better prospects where income and standard of living are concerned. In the name of protection, our labour law ended up making supposed conquests, that were later destroyed by the crisis, more illusory than real. We believe that the reform in the labour law is inevitable, and that what has been done so far is simply not enough.

But, together with the flexibility we seek, which has not yet been embodied in our legislation, there must be a complete transformation of our social security system, which is onerous for workers and employers due to its impact on salaries, and which is unsatisfactory in the benefits it provides.

The pension system must be replaced by a new one which has more credibility, coherence and which will be able to solve the problems inherent in the transition with regard to the present beneficiaries. In addition to this it should be able to provide those who at present part of the workforce with the promise that they will be covered during their retirement.

There should also be a reassessment of the present health system in the framework of social benefit system. Monopolies that are incompatible with competition models should be abandoned, for it is these models that guarantee transparency, quality and reasonable prices.

In the light of the above, it is quite clear that we have come before this Conference to speak about the democratisation process, which we are experiencing first hand. As a participant in this process we consider the ILO's support to be essential in making our structural changes effective, and our legislation appropriate to enable us to become one of the modern democracies based on economic growth and social development.

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – Firstly, I congratulate the President of this Session of the International Labour Conference on his election, on behalf of my union (the General Workers' Union), and also on behalf on the other Maltese unions grouped in the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions.

Secondly, I wish to thank the ILO's Director-General for the laudable Report he has presented us with this year, the first part of which turns the spotlight on democratisation.

Democracy is not just having a pluralistic society, a multiparty system and the holding of free elections. Democracy is also, among other things, the respect and full observance of fundamental human and trade union rights and freedoms. For example, workers in state or parastatal employment should not be discriminated against by governments in respect of promotion because of their union affiliation or political beliefs. But, unfortunately, these things have happened and are still happening.

One of the most basic rights of workers is to work in an environment free of hazards to life and limb. The European Community must be commended for designating 1992 as the European Year of Safety, Hygiene and Health Protection at Work.

This brings to mind that, in 1987, the Maltese Government accepted a proposal by my union to establish a national occupational health and safety authority on a tripartite basis. This authority has not yet been set up and, worse still, the Safety Unit at the Labour Department has been almost completely abandoned. In fact this unit today consists of only three inspectors and a clerk.

To democratise places of work my union, over the years, has succeeded in introducing workers' participation systems in the management of parastatal corporations and state-owned enterprises, whereby every two years the workers elect one of themselves to represent them as worker-director on the respective board of directors.

My union has for long been proposing that the number of worker-directors should not remain limited to one on each board. Government says it agrees that the workers' participation system should be strengthened, but when we come to facts it is a very different story. For example, in 1988 the Government set up an inter-ministerial committee to report on giving new dimensions to participation systems. After four years this report is still on the drawing board.

In spite of the fact that the report is still being drawn up, the Government issued directives that an employee who is a candidate at parliamentary general elections cannot stand for election as worker-director. The Government said the reason was to avoid politicising the running of parastatal or state-owned companies. But the same Government appointed to the boards of these companies candidates who contested general elections on the ruling party's platform.

One of the buttresses of democracy is social justice, and that is how I view one of the items on the agenda of this Conference – that is, the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency.

My Union is demanding that workers' privileged pay in the case of company bankruptcies and closures be raised to six months' pay because the present 200 Maltese pounds does not reflect the level of today's wages. But the Government has till now rejected this claim and my Union has now put it on the agenda of a tripartite committee within the Malta Council for Economic Development, which is discussing changes in various aspects of industrial relations legislation.

Last year the International Labour Conference adopted a Convention and a supporting Recommendation aimed at regulating working conditions for workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. We urge the Maltese Government to ratify this Convention without unnecessary delay, especially because certain hotel and restaurant owners in the summer months, when tourism in Malta is at its peak, are illegally engaging under-age children to work, even during late hours, in the back rooms washing dishes.

Child labour is also to be found in other sectors and this scandal is gaining more alarming proportions, so much so that, on the occasion of this year's May Day, the Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church in Malta felt the need to express his grave concern and spoke in very strong forms about this immorality of child labour abuse. As the Archbishop said, child labour goes against the dignity of man, and this particularly when children are made to work on a part-time basis without having any guarantee that their health and rights will be protected.

Therefore, it is our moral duty as trade unionists to appeal to the Maltese Government to take action to put an end to this shameful exploitation of children. We must emphasise the fact that when children are at work they are at the same time missing from school, missing from home, and missing from childhood itself.

To conclude, I state that respect of the rights of under-aged and defenceless children also forms one of the cornerstones of social justice and democracy.

Mr. THAILUAN (Workers' delegate, Thailand) – First of all, on behalf of the labour force of Thailand which I represent I would like to express my heartiest congratulations to the President on his election to direct the work of this Session of the International Labour Conference. I believe that under his leadership this meeting will be a success.

As you know, Thailand is developing its technological, political and social bases. These developments have a direct impact on the labour force in Thailand, and I would like to take this opportunity to inform you of the way this impact is felt.

As the country has developed, shifting its economic base from agriculture to industry, labour has moved from the agricultural sector to the industrial sector at a critical rate, affecting the adjustment to a new society, working conditions, the used modern technologies, safety and education. The educational level of the labour force is admittedly low. When workers move into the industrial sector, their education level is considered very, very low. The employer or investor always takes advantage of the labour force in this respect by hiring at a lower wage rate, providing workers with poor social protection and showing no concern for their standard of living.

The development of educational for the labour force is a matter of still less concern for both private industry and the Government. It is true that some private businesses provide education for their workers, but they only do so when it is in their own interests. Such programmes are not intended to upgrade the workers' skills for the benefit of the workers themselves.

The Government, for its part, devotes very little resources in comparison with the overall budget for the industrial sector to the enhancement of the labour force's skills. Obviously, in circumstances such as these, with the labour force not being developed it is bound to be exploited forever.

It can hardly be said that there is any occupational safety in the industrial sector. Year after year, as both employers and the Governement do not pay sufficient attention to this problem, the rate of deaths caused by accidents remains high. This is especially true for workers engaged in construction work.

As for chemical hazards, they claim many lives and cause many injuries as well. This problem is especially acute for multinational corporations operating in Thailand. These corporations show no concern for the safety of their workers and never inform them of chemical hazards. The workers know nothing of such hazards.

It may surprise you to learn that the Thai Government has only a small occupational safety unit, with very few employees. It is called the Safety Institute. The Institute plays no role in ensuring occupational safety. The Government has not paid sufficient attention to this matter. The Institute runs with a small budget allocated by the Government. It manages fund-raising programmes along with private enterprises to support its operations. This is why the mortality rate of the Thai labour force is so high.

As regards penalties imposed on employers violating the Safety Act in Thailand, these employers are given fines which they quite simply pay and then go back to work as usual. For example, a factory recently released waste water contaminated with toxic chemicals into a river. Many fish died, and the people in the region faced a great deal of hardship. National resources were damaged. The only penalty imposed, though, was a fine. Moreover, because multinational corporations do not transfer genuine technologies to the workers, they are particularly harmful and bear responsibility for the death of Thai workers every day.

Thai workers and the Thai labour unions have been deprived of their freedom. All their actions and movements are tightly controlled by the Government. As you have seen, the Government has tried to issue laws reducing workers' rights. This concerns not only freedom of association but also the right to strike and the right to assemble. When the military seized power from the Government on 23 February 1991, the new Government issued two laws. The first dissolved the labour union of state enterprise employees, thus affecting the right to make claims and the freedom of association of more than 200,000 employees. The second law was designed to abolish the right to strike, which constitutes the bargaining power of trade unions. The employers, as capitalists, are satisfied with these laws since they permit them to continue taking advantage of Thai workers.

The leaders of the Thai labour force are not, however, discouraged. They are fighting for what they believe in and hope for, despite many obstacles. In addition, we hope to receive support from our friends around the world, for as the saying goes, "All workers are brothers". I would like to thank the ILO Regional Office in Thailand for its support, which I hope will continue in the future.

Finally, on behalf of the workers, I would like to thank the President once again for giving me the opportunity to speak here today.

Original – Spanish: Mr. LESCANO (Workers' delegate, Argentina) – The workers of Argentina would like, first of all, to congratulate the Director-General for his wisdom in choosing as the subject of his Report Democratisation and the ILO.

The image of democracy is becoming tarnished from within society itself and because of this some of its beneficiaries seemed unwilling to help uphold its prestige.

We cannot consider acceptable a model of social organisation which in the name of efficiency prevents the majority of the population from achieving better living conditions.

It would even appear in certain cases that the safeguarding of democracy against possible authoritarianism is prompted only by a fear of suffering from the errors and abuses that have already been experienced under governments of this type and not for genuine and honourable reasons.

Steps need to be taken to encourage stability and economic development which always respect the principles of equity and a fair distribution of effort and sacrifice by all social groups.

We want a democracy in which the State concerns itself with and guarantees essential matters such as life, health, education, social security, defense and justice: a State which is not indifferent to social inequalities nor heartless in the face of those who are suffering and need protection.

For example, it is incumbent upon the State to guarantee the quality of life of the population. We mean by this that the health and education budget is not expenditure, but investment, and its only limit should be that necessary to ensure a fair psychic, physical and social balance for the inhabitants.

Nor can the State shirk its responsibility to deal with the contingencies covered by social security. It is incumbent upon the State and the State alone to make sure that those who have forged the development of the country through their labour are guaranteed a decent old age.

By this we mean that we are anxious that a State based on the rule of law can coexist with a State, guarantor of social justice.

The accelerated process of the reconversion of capital has not succeeded in resolving the serious social problems which give us cause for concern, as is the case in many other countries of the world with problems similar to ours.

The recessive models of adjustment applied in nations suffering from a heavy burden of foreign and national debt, generated by the few, has to be borne by the working people, regardless of the principle of equality in the fair distribution and of efforts among the various social groups.

We the workers, in our country have achieved the longed-for unity of the trade union movement, which has already shouldered its obligation towards history and is playing its part in the new transforming role of the modern world.

It is up to the employers to convert capital into a productive entity and take on the attendant risks, generate income for society, not just individual profits, create new jobs, pay better wages and strengthen the internal market by incorporating technologies without State intervention or protection, and guaranteeing competitivity.

In placing capital at the service of a social economy, the essential prerequisite for the generation of employment is economic growth and it has not been shown that labour flexibility alone is an ideal factor contributing to this growth.

It can happen that economic growth needs to be tempered by machinery to regulate workers' rights but the only valid way is through collective bargaining.

In our country, flouting the principle of legality and collective autonomy by a simple act of the executive has caused irreparable damage to the constitutional right to bargain collectively and therefore to the freedom of association. A decree of the Argentine Government has put conditions on wage negotiations, which have had the undesirable result of making wages a variable factor in adjustment. Very few bodies or entities have been able successfully to bargain in such conditions.

We understand that collective bargaining should take place within a context of total freedom in conformity with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which have been ratified by Argentina. Their regulations harm only the most unprotected sector, namely the workers.

Moving on, we ask the ILO for the broadest possible technical cooperation in connection with the establishment of the MERCOSUR, the common market of the Southern Cone, since while we are aware that it is not possible to emerge from the crisis without integration we also know that it is not possible just to have economic integration without taking account of social and labour integration as well, and that such integration needs a dynamic workers' movement, organised within a tripartite structure, as displayed by the ILO.

In this philosophy, trade union participation must take place within the context of freedom of association as laid down by ILO Convention No 87. That is to say, countries should integrate the principle of free and democratic association in the framework of a State based on the rule of law, with elected leaders who respect human rights.

We call on our political leaders to place the common good before sectoral interest, and to create a climate of greater credibility, and confidence, to help raise the value of labour and production.

We exhort the employers to meet the challenge of increasing wealth by promoting a fairer distribution and encouraging the creation of new sources of employment. We invite them to make every effort to avoid creating poverty, even if they have to reduce their own profit. In view of all I have said, the Argentine workers' movement, hopes that the State based on the rule of law which, in our case, we have recovered through our unstinting efforts, can be transformed into a democratic State with social justice.

Mr. JALE (Government delegate, Fiji) – On behalf of the delegation of Fiji, I take this opportunity to join other speakers in congratulating the President of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference on his election.

Fiji last attended the International Labour Conference in 1985, not because of choice but for factors beyond my country's control. Despite being absent for that long, my country continued to maintain its links with the International Labour Office on matters of interest and matters relevant to obligations under the ILO Constitution.

Fiji has been honoured to host the South Pacific Office of the ILO continuously since 1975, which has brought the services of the Organisation closer not only to my country but to the South Pacific region in general.

At this point, I feel that it is appropriate to welcome the Governments of Albania, the Republic of Korea, Latvia, Estonia and others, that have recently joined the Organisation and extend to them the best wishes of my country for the future.

Fiji has continously benefited from projects implemented by the ILO in the areas of adult education and training for rural women, tourism, vocational programmes training for logging workers, programmes for urban youth on setting up or developing one's own business, employment promotion, manpower planning and labour administration. We note in the Director-General's Report the ILO's readiness to respond to any request for assistance addressed to it by governments wishing to establish an effective labour administration and to strengthen their employment and labour inspection services and my country welcomes the offer.

In 1991, Fiji participated in seminars and workshops organised by ILO and held outside the South Pacific region in the areas of safety in the use of chemicals at work, standard-related topics, special services for rural workers organisations, the role and strengthening of lead institutions, advanced technology training and employment services.

The Report of the Director-General on the activities of the ILO in 1991 confirms the untiring efforts of the ILO to improve the standards of living for the people of the world. That deserves encouragement and commendation. Drug abuse is a social concern in most countries in the world and our part of the world is not an exception. We note with interest the establishment of the joint ILO/WHO project to control drug and alcohol problems among workers.

Fiji supports the views expressed in the introduction to the Director-General's Report on the Organisation's support for democracy at both national and organisational levels. Following the political events of 1987, Fiji held its general election from 23 to 30 of May 1992. The Fiji delegation left before the completion of the election. But one thing is sure: the incoming Government will continue support for the principles of democracy.

The development of a small island State such as Fiji has historically been handicapped by a number of obstacles which include: its geographical location and its being scattered over large areas of water, making communication and transport expensive and costly, and posing serious constraints on access to our trading partners; its small population and limited economic resource base which have restricted economies of scale; and the fact it is often subject to natural disasters (hurricanes, droughts and floods) which are detrimental to the economy.

In spite of these constraints and handicaps, Fiji's economic performance over the last five years has recovered remarkably well.

The balance of payments fluctuated from "red" (F$49.1m) in 1987 to "black" ($55.5 m) in 1990.

Paid employment which stagnated around 80,000 throughout the eighties rose significantly in 1989 to 89,000 reaching 91,000 in 1991.

There are two significant issues to bear in mind from what has been said: Fiji's geographical location and our scatteredness have shifted substantial resources into communications and transport. Any disruption in these areas will be very costly to the economy and to our people; the remarkable recovery of Fiji's economy in the post-coup period has encouraged the Government to maintain its resolve in pursuing its current economic policies.

To this end, the Fiji Government has introduced deregulation of its economy to bring prices more closely into line with world prices, restrict the growth of Government expenditure, ensure availability of resources for growth in the private sector, reform the system of direct and indirect taxation to minimise market distorsions and improve incentives for risk taking and effort, and establish a wage policy that recognises the paramount importance of maintaining international competitiveness, the mobilisation of all sectors of the community in support of economic expansion and the reorientation of sector policies in accordance with the above general policies.

As to the labour market, in early and mid-1980 Fiji was concerned with the improper use of union bargaining power and industrial actions which gave rise to high wage settlements for unionised workers resulting in high rates of inflation and diminished job opportunities in the economy as a whole. The uncompetitive nature of Fiji's industry deterred investment and impeded the growth of the economy. The labour market in Fiji was characterised by a multiplicity of regulations and control over wages and other terms and conditions. Many international organisations had advised that for Fiji to become internationally competitive, it must address some of the rigidities in the labour market.

In 1991 the Fiji Government enacted changes to some of its labour legislation which included the removal of wages and salary guidelines which imposed statutory limits on the levels of settlements throughout the economy. This meant that trade unions and others were free to negotiate whatever settlements they could with the employers, instituting free collective bargaining. As a counterpart to this, labour legislation was amended to ensure that: union members are firmly in control of the actions of their union and its leaders; negotiations between employers and trade unions are conducted in a responsible manner, with the strike weapon used only as a last resort.

The changes also include the following measures: extension of opportunity for voting in the election of union officials through postal and/or workplace ballots; allowing trade unions and employers to decide through collective bargaining the method of union due deductions and the supervision of all voting on certain matters by an independent person.

My Government is committed to ILO principles, which were taken into consideration when the labour market reforms were introduced.

Whilst the Fiji Trades Union Congress and the ICFTU imply that they are committed to ILO principles, they have acted in the opposite by disregarding ILO complaint procedures and not allowing them to take their own course in their opposition to Fiji's labour market reforms. The ICFTU organised boycotts against Fiji which seriously affected our economy even after the ICFTU had lodged a complaint to the ILO alleging that our reforms are in contravention of some ILO instruments. Such action by the Fiji Trades Union Congress and the ICFTU in undermining the ILO procedures should be strongly deplored by the ILO and necessary remedies should be put in place to protect the interests of member countries. My country had replied to the ICFTU complaint and it is not fair for those organisations to continue with their destructive actions. Fiji should be allowed its sovereign right to decide its own fate through internal means without interference from outsiders.

Mr. EKSTROM (Under Secretary of State, Ministry of Labour, Sweden) – First of all I like to join the previous speakers and congratulate the President upon his election to this honourable post.

Over the past few years we have withnessed economic and political change unprecedented in peacetime in this century. A significant feature of these changes is that the movements for political freedom have nearly everywhere coincided with simultaneous movements for economic reform.

Economic systems, political processes and labour institutions are deeply interrelated and interdependent. Important aspects of these mutual influences are dealt with in the Director-General's Report to this year's session of the Conference.

The Report focuses on the fundamental principles of the ILO and what the ILO stands for – democracy, work, peace. Political freedom and civil liberties are closely associated with progress in economic development, health and education.

The end of the Cold War offers new challenges to the world community. However, many of the threats to human survival remain. The enormous imbalance between North and South stands basically unchanged. Environmental degradation, the pressure of population growth and poverty-driven migration are but some of the issues that may become causes of new conflicts.

The problems are global and must be dealt with globally. The global institutions must focus on making more headway in the social and economic fields. That is the real challenge in the 1990s. The question is – are we prepared for that challenge or will we rather remain prisoners of the past and prisoners of the procedures we created during different circumstances?

More than 1 billion people, one-fifth of the world's population, live on less than US$1 a day, a standard of living that Western Europe attained 200 years ago.

According to the International Fund for Agricultural Development, based on present trends, by the turn of the century, 700 million rural women will be below the poverty line. Almost everywhere the contribution of women is undervalued and often goes unnoticed by policy-makers. Women work under economic and social constraints and their voices are seldom heard in places where decisions are made.

To these poor people, the favourite concepts mentioned at this rostrum – democracy, markets, human rights – have little or no concrete meaning. Still, each one of them has the right to claim compassion and solidarity from us who are better off.

The role of the ILO in this context is to assist in combating poverty through the development of employment. According to the Report of the Director-General and to other ILO documents at hand, the Office from now on intends to focus more on policy advice than on the execution of projects. I certainly welcome such a development. It is in line with what the Nordic Governments have argued for within the United Nations system for years.

Good policy advice to developing countries and countries in transition alike, and work relevant to all member countries, however, has to be based on solid knowledge. Such knowledge can, to my understanding, only be derived from intensive and comprehensive research, and the collection and evaluation of experiences from various parts of the world.

The crucial need for the accumulation of knowledge and research on development matters does not seem to be given enough prominence in the present strategy. To put it bluntly, since there will not be much development money over the next decade, there had better be a lot of good ideas.

Human capital is a principal asset of the poor. Raising its return has to be a central investment strategy, and therefore a research priority. The ILO should be the international centre of excellence for social and economic policies related to the world of work. But, and this is important, not by claiming that status. The ILO should aim at being granted that position through outstandingly competent work.

To be action-oriented is often regarded as something positive. The ILO should, however, focus more on questions like what sort of action, strategy, implementation, etc. And the aim should never be to try to satisfy everybody, or to try to find the least common denominator for all the more than 150 member States, not to mention workers and employers. A more bold and innovative approach to sensitive issues is called for.

During the seventies and eighties the main focus of international economic debate and politics has been on other fields than work and working life. The experiences and lessons gained point to the nineties as a period of revival for the ILO's fields of responsibility and mandate.

The Organisation now has great opportunities of moving into the front line of international discussions concerning the interaction of economic, social and human conditions. Through fresh initiatives the ILO can help create fertile soil for new, deeper insights into the fundamental role of enterprise and work in economic and social development and progress.

The tasks and tripartite structure of the ILO give the organisation unique opportunities. At the same time, they place responsibilities on the ILO, which has to adapt to the changing requirements, not least in respect of its own organisation and working procedures.

The ongoing interdepartmental programmes and the proposed multidisciplinary regional teams are, when viewed in isolation, very attractive endeavours. It is, however, somewhat uncertain what the relation between these new structures and the rest of the Office is. One cannot help feeling that new administrative structures are put on top of or added to existing structures.

Already today, the structure of the Office is very complicated, with a lot of more or less autonomous bodies and thich walls within and between departments. In many ways, the organisational set-up reflects past problems, not present realities. Perhaps the time is ripe for a major examination of the whole Office, including the field organisation, in the light of the requirements of modern administration and management, in order fully to profit from the expertise of the competent staff that this Organisation has at its disposal.

We appreciate the need for structural adjustment and change in the private sector and in national organisations. There is no reason why the same should not apply to international bodies.

In today's world no country can frame its economic policy in a reasonable manner by taking into account exclusively its own concerns and its own national objectives. Policies must be determined with a view to the collective optimum.

My conclusion will be brief. Every country and, inside every country, all participants in economic life, whether they be governments, employers or workers, must accept a share of responsibility for the collective management of the world economy. I think that in the world today, the one word "solidarity" must be in the forefront: solidarity not only between the different countries of the world but also within each country, where we need to rediscover the necessity and virtues of solidarity between the different sections of the population.

Mr. MALLIA MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election and to wish him every success in guiding the heavy workload of this session of the Conference.

As is customary with the annual session of the Conference of our Organisation, the Director-General has chosen as the theme of his Report to this year's session a highly topical and thought-provoking subject which goes straight to the roots of the ILO and has important implications not only for the future development of the global economy but also of the kind of society to which we all aspire. The subject chosen, Democratisation and the ILO is a concept which presents the challenge of adapting our strategies, our efforts and our behaviour to a rapidily changing world. A strategy which requires us to be imaginative and innovative in devising new methods of action for the ILO and each of its three constituent participants to tackle new problems.

This year's Report by the Director-General focuses on the essential responsibility of our Organisation to help employers and workers in those countries – and they are many – which are moving towards a market economy or entering a period of democratisation where free bargaining is still a new and alien process. At the same time, the Report also highlights the responsibility falling on us all to assist the Governments of those countries in their efforts to develop and consolidate genuine democracy.

The world is passing through a time of far-reaching change and consolidation where, in a very brief period of time, an unprecedented large number of countries on several continents have abandoned the concept of a command economy – and the preponderant and overbearing role of the authoritarian State which inevitably goes with it – in favour of an open economy and the law-abiding State.

This is a time when all kinds of barriers are falling down and the resurgence of old nationalisms is redrawing the political map.

The reawakening to democratic values by these countries is due in large part to the consistent striving of the ILO since its foundation. Has not the ILO fought tooth and nail for social justice and for full participation of the worker and the employer in free discussion with governments so that freedom and equal opportunity would be available to one and all without discrimination?

The ILO has already set the pace for others to follow. But one should not rest on one's laurels. The immediate challenge is to assist the new emerging democracies to put down deep and permanent roots and to establish themselves in peace with their neighbours. At the same time, the law of the market cannot be allowed to become the law of the jungle.

The fall of Marxism does not remove the injustices on which it thrived. It neither means the drive of capitalism. The peoples of Eastern Europe destroyed the walls of division to create a new society based on freedom, democracy and solidarity. The root causes for agitation must be corrected for the market economy to assume a human face.

For this to come about, the full and unfettered participation of the three social partners in continuous dialogue is essential. This, too, is an indispensable ingredient of democratisation. In this field, the ILO has much to offer. Its unique tripartite structure and its vast experience of industrial relations can help the emerging democracies – as it does for us all – to construct solid and lasting foundations for the full play of the tripartite system within their societies. Not least, it can assist in building a new genuine and democratic trade unions and associations of employers, separate and distinct from the State.

As repeatedly stressed by the Conference, it is essential for the trade union movement in each country to preserve its freedom and independence so as to be in a position to carry forward its economic and social mission irrespective of political changes.

In this respect, I am glad to record that in my country, Malta, the statutory fusion between the General Workers' Union and the Malta Labour Party was formally dissolved by both organisations earlier this year. We had repeatedly from this rostrum expressed our unhappiness at this unnecessarily close identification of the largest trade union in Malta with a political party. It is now my duty and pleasure to congratulate both organisations on their wise decision.

Tripartism is the best method that will help to defend democracy in those countries which have chosen this political style. Tripartism as advocated and practised by the ILO is the system of labour relations in which the State, employers and workers are autonomous parties, each organisation performing specific functions. The methods of dialogue, consultation and negotiation are the indispensable stages through which countries have to pass in order to work out and implement socially acceptable economic and social policies.

Trade unions and employers' organisations should be structured in such a way to be able to act effectively and to speak authoritatively in their new tasks in the political and economic environment. Regretfully, we are still a long way from this goal.

In his Report, the Director-General proposes three priorities as a plan for action by the ILO. Firstly, the Organisation's support of democratisation; secondly assistance in the war against poverty; and thirdly, the promotion of workers' protection. These are all laudable objectives which this Conference will surely and wholeheartedly endorse. In further defining the ILO's role in attaining these goals, the Director-General's Report makes specific reference to the importance – in supporting the foundation of democratisation – of guaranteeing adequate protection for the rights of workers. This emphasis is fully understandable in the context in which it is made. And certainly nobody in this hall can have any reservations as to its validity and necessity. But my delegation, for one, would also have liked to see some reference, however brief, to the concept of educating workers also to their obligations. All rights are necessarily balanced by obligations, and it is well for all of us to keep this constantly in mind.

One of the items on our agenda for this session is human resources development. Quite rightly, this finds an echo in the Director-General's Report in the context of democratisation. The Director-General is perfectly right to emphasise the growing recognition on the part of various international organisations of the progressive linkage between human rights, human resources development, democracy and socio-economic development. Amongst many quotations marshalled by the Director-General in support of this linkage we find declarations by the United Nations General Assembly, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme. Of special significance is the affirmation by the World Bank that any notion of strictly economic progress must at a minimum look beyond growth in per capita income, to the reduction of poverty and greater equity, to progress in education, health and nutrition, and to the protection of the environment, so that even purely economic progress cannot be measured in strictly economic terms.

For its part, the United Nations General Assembly, in adopting the International Development Strategy for the Fourth UN Development Decade at its 45th Session, is convinced that human resources development, together with entrepreneurship, innovation and the energetic application of science and technology in a context of political freedom, respect for human rights, justice and equity, are all essential and relevant to growth and development.

My delegation fully subscribes to these views. We are also convinced that just as political constraints, in the words of the Director-General, reduce the chances of economic success, so a lack of political liberties stifles the full development of the individual. Human resources, especially for countries like mine, for which they constitute their major if not the only resource, need to be maximised and fully harnessed. This is now recognised by all the social partners in Malta and by all sectors of society.

Education, training and retraining programmes designed to equip and adapt the working population at all levels to the challenges of the future enjoy universal support, not least from our employers.

With the euthusiastic support of the Government, employers in Malta have joined together in establishing a Foundation for Human Resources Development to promote research and other activities designed to broaden and deepen the science of personnel management and the fullest development of the nation's human resources capital. In this respect, I note with great interest from the Director-General's Report that the ILO intends to help member States adapt their training systems to become more flexible and capable of responding more promptly to the ever-changing demands of the occupational environment.

Earlier in my statement, I referred to the balance that should be maintained between rights and obligations. One man's rights are frequently another's obligations. Democracy is built on the respect of the rights of the individual. Since the individual plays a crucial part in the electoral process, it is obvious that when a group of individuals advances its collective interests against another group, the group representing the larger number of individuals tends to carry more influence than the smaller group. It is in the nature of things that organisations of workers represent far more individuals than employers' organisations. As a result, it is not unknown for governments to acquiesce in demands of trade unions over the objections of employers and perhaps to the detriment of society as a whole.

Responsible democracy requires self-discipline. This is especially so in the field of industrial relations. No group should use its electoral muscle to advance its purely sectoral interests. It should be prepared to accept restrictions on its own freedom of action so as to ensure that the interests of other groups are not lightly sacrificed and that the interests of the nation as a whole will always prevail.

Democracy is a fragile plant which must be nurtured in a climate on the widest possible consensus. It is not for manipulation by any group against another.

Original – Spanish: Mr. OBRAGON SABOGAL (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – Among the topics selected for discussion at this Conference are the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of their employer, the prevention of industrial disasters such as the one which occurred in Bophal, India, the struggle to ensure that adjustment does not impair the development of human resources and measures of action against apartheid. These are the fields in which progress must be made if we genuinely want to affirm the specific role of the ILO in the democratisation process which is now in full swing and which is the central theme chosen by the Director-General for his Report.

Since its foundation, the ILO has been promoting social dialogue as a vital factor in political democracy, and has constantly striven to combat poverty; indeed, we believe that this path leads to political democracy and social and cultural democracy.

Tradition has it that the concept of democracy is largely confined to an electoral formality; but the international effort to promote democratisation is increasing awareness of freedom, and the full exercise of human rights, enabling the people to assume their own responsibilities. This is possible when guarantees protect the opposition, and in the absence of hegemonic, monopolistic or exclusive parties.

Democracy has to guarantee channels for the participation of citizens in the effective exercise of power and the control of authority. Civilian society has to be strong if there is to be real democracy.

In his Report, the Director-General states that the institutions which facilitate and encourage participation in affairs strengthen democracy. In my country, the Government does not consult or listen. The Single Confederation of Workers, which I have the honour to lead, has directed its efforts towards bringing about concertation in fields as delicate and of such importance as opening up of the economy, privatisation and labour flexibility. But concertation is a word that the Government uses only to improve its image abroad, but does not practise at home.

The recognition of political freedoms serves no purpose if citizens do not have the opportunity to enjoy decent living conditions and are restricted in their constitutional rights to work, education, health, housing and recreation. When there is no social democracy, the system cannot be considered democratic, and we therefore entirely agree with the Director-General on the need to promote a policy of democratisation in countries where the situations I have mentioned prevail.

Successive Colombian Governments have restricted the budget for social expenditure with the result that at present there is no effective social policy. Poverty is increasing alarmingly and the State is failing more and more to offer protection in the social field. To cite just one example, in the case of pension insurance there is disregard for ILO Conventions and Recommendations in the sense that benefits are not administered by non-profit-making institutions. The Government is intending to hand them over to transnational insurance authorities.

In the Colombian brand of democracy, violations of human rights and trade union and political freedoms continue with the traditional impunity; in addition to the long list of murders denounced at this Conference in 1991, we now have to add 102 new murders, including in particular members of the Workers' Trade Unions Confederation, as well as attacks on its premises.

The rights of the workers under the labour reform are diminishing. "There can be no democracy without trade unionism", the ILO has said in recognising trade union organisations as "the main pillar of tripartism". We the workers know that we play a crucial role in the consolidation of democracy and in its defence and expansion. We are directing our efforts not only towards defending the interests of our members, but we also concern ourselves with overall decisions on the running of our society.

But our actions are obstructed by the Government and the employers who deny workers access to decision-making bodies. Some are prompted by a desire for a docile and subservient trade union movement, while others want to build a world without trade unions. This anti-unionism is unprecedented. The machinery to guarantee the protection of the development of the trade union movement is practically non-existent. The employers, as is the case in the cocoa industry, are constantly undermining the right to bargain collectively, while seeking to eliminate the trade union movement through court orders against union leaders and forcing workers to leave trade unions. Or consider the case of the Cementos del Valle, where 12 trade union leaders were sentenced to imprisonment and had to pay compensation to the enterprise in the amount of $1,120,000 because they organised a strike.

In our democracy, the Government and employers equate strikes and work stoppages with subversion and may respond to us in that vein by declaring trade union action illegal, militarising labour disputes, dismissing trade union officials who organised stoppages and imposing financial penalties on trade union organisations. Now they are using the courts and trying trade unionists as terrorists, as happened in the case of the work stoppage in telecommunications.

This trade union repression is accompanied, on the one hand, by a denial of basic rights, such as the right to collective bargaining of more than 600,000 public employees in violation of Convention No. 98, ratified by Colombia in 1976, and, on the other hand, by a constant campaign in the media to denigrate the Colombian trade union movement. There are a number of cases that we have brought to the attention of the Committee of Freedom of Association and we are doing so here in this Conference with a formal complaint backed by the Association of Labour Lawyers in the service of the Colombian workers. At the same time, the workers' confederations of my country are seeking to recover the rights snatched away from the workers, and we have submitted to the Congress of the Republic proposals for a Workers' Charter which have provoked a virulent reaction on the part of both Government and employers. Because of this, and bearing in mind the words of the Director-General of the ILO to the effect that this Organisation will devote more attention to assistance for the purpose of building more open and fairer societies, I respectfully ask for a special mission to be sent to my country to analyse the industrial relations situation.

In reaffirming our belief in democracy, we are expressing the deep concern of the workers over the reliance on a brutal model of unbridled capitalism which leaves the field open for action by monopolies, which hand over the nation's assets at bargain prices to transnational enterprises, weakening the democratic system. This model, in the case of Colombia, has led by different means to the dismissal of nearly 500,000 workers.

May I end with a quotation from His Holiness John Paul II when he addressed the International Labour Conference: "Considerations which are solely financial and budgetary cannot justify a dismissive attitude to the social dimension. The inalienable dignity of man and the protection of workers, which are supreme values in any society, cannot be flouted with impunity."

Original – French: Mr. NORDMANN (Government delegate, Switzerland) – Firstly, I should like to congratulate the President on his brilliant election to the Chair of this 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should also like to congratulate the two Vice-presidents, one of whom I am proud to note hails from our country. His work at this Session confirms the constructive role of Switzerland within our Organisation.

The excellent Report submitted by the Director-General raises certain points which I should like to address before this assembly.

At first sight, the challenges of democratisation may appear far removed from the concerns of a country such as Switzerland, which has a long tradition of democracy.

However, the reverse is true, for situated as it is at the centre of the European continent and open to the world, my country is aware of the fact that the rights connected to democracy and economic prosperity are dependent on a constant readiness to adapt.

Thus, we have always chosen to adhere totally to the basic principles of the ILO. We have ratified the Organisation's Conventions on fundamental human rights; we have also considered it necessary to strengthen our presence within the community of nations by participating, for instance, in many United Nations initiatives and by deciding to ratify the United Nations Covenants on Human Rights of 1966. At the regional level we have embarked upon a basic policy to be able to participate as efficiently as possible in the construction of Europe. Finally, we have set up an ambitious programme to offer support to central and eastern European countries.

We now have a growing all-out commitment, demonstrating that to govern is not only to look ahead, but also and above all to act in a spirit of solidarity for the common good.

What then is the role of our Organisation in this context? Generally speaking, we endorse the guidelines contained in the excellent Report submitted to us by the Director-General. The new climate in international relations has made it possible to close ideological rifts. It should enable us in the future to focus our energy on the creation of a healthy market economy with the appropriate social measures this would require.

I should now like to focus on four main points. Firstly, we believe that the ILO should continue to play the historic and traditional role which it has been playing in recent years. The current climate is conducive to new departures in certain spheres of ILO activity. However, the ILO should avoid changing its role within the United Nations system and within the international community while responding to emerging expectations.

Secondly, the new challenges before the ILO do indeed require reforms and the reallocation of resources within its programme and budget. Nevertheless, our Organisation should not call into question those major achievements which have built up its credibility and value over the years, such as standard setting activities, technical cooperation, monitoring social justice and development.

Thirdly, in the light of what I have just said I would request that our Organisation now embark upon in-depth and serious consideration of its future as regards international labour standards. There already is an excellent report on this adopted by the Governing Body towards the end of the 1980s. This report was quite clairvoyant with regard to the main thrust of standard-setting policy of the ILO. While some efforts have already been made, we must give the ILO the tools it needs to meet the challenges of the democracies of the twenty-first century. This calls for the creation of international labour standards and above all the judicious revision of those already in place.

The same is true for the monitoring system. It has guaranteed the impartiality of the Organisation through long periods of tension, and it is still just as important and valuable in the present circumstances. It cannot, in our opinion, be dissociated from a standard-setting system with the values common to all, whatever the circumstances of the moment. This system may be refined and complemented, but it should not under any circumstances be challenged, even if this is sometimes hard to accept.

Finally, the ILO should also ensure that within its own institutions there is full compliance with the main democratic principles mentioned in the Director-General's Report.

In the workings of the ILO's bodies it is very important to us that the voice of the small countries be heard as clearly as that of the larger countries. This is a question of respect for minorities and equality of treatment, just as it should be in any genuine democracy.

This intervention should also permit me to reaffirm the full support of my country and of myself for the future activities of the Organisation. We are always mindful that all measures under consideration, be they budgetary, technical or others, should further the general well-being.

Original – German: Mr. TEGTMEIER (Secretary of State, Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, Germany) – This year the Director-General has chosen as the theme of his Report: Democratisation and the ILO. This was a timely choice. We are living in a decade in which democratisation has been triumphing although there are some setbacks. The ILO is a natural forum to discuss democracy in certain countries.

Indeed, since the Declaration of Philadelphia, the International Labour Organisation has been the guardian and bulwark of democratisation. It provides instruments and assistance to make sure that member States can develop peace within their own boundaries.

It is praiseworthy that the Director-General has highlighted the role of the ILO in this process of transition towards democracy.

The political processes of democratisation, accompanied by revolutionary upheavals, are so far ahead of developments of the social market economy in many countries that they have often left the solution of social problems far behind.

We may witness this in all countries undergoing a transition from a centrally planned economy to a social market economy. This process of transition is associated with a great deal of pain and structural breakdowns.

I have been experiencing this very closely in my own country – the east of Germany. It is very important that during any process of democratisation, the social vulnerability of people should be taken into account, as they have to survive the transformation from a planned economy to a market economy.

The hearts and minds of the people have to accompany this process. Therefore, when a transition is made from a centrally planned political order, which deprives people of personal room for manoeuvre, to a system which lays emphasis on personal responsibility, there must be a specific social backup for the population. A market economy system precisely needs this sound social basis because, without it, it cannot guarantee any economic and pratical progress. Even the most rational political or economic system has to fail if it is not accepted by the population – when it is not seen as "their country" or "their society". Even in democratic countries citizens do not expect a paradise on earth. What they do expect is an equitable balance between their commitment – the commitment they are making – and the benefit which they derive from their contribution. Give and take in a situation of balanced solidarity is a principle of democracy and the social state in equal measure.

In trying to establish this balance the ILO can provide vital assistance because of its tripartite structure. I welcome the fact that the ILO is aware that it can provide such assistance within the terms of its own traditional mandate, such as: the establishment of labour administrations, relations between the social partners, the reform of labour law and social security assistance. The involvement on an equal footing of workers' and employers' organisations in the ILO is a good example of democracy as it is experienced daily. Through this involvement it is possible to make sure that, in addition to the governments, the social groups are involved from the outset in the restructuring process – and this is a guarantee for a more practical approach. Acceptance from citizens in the reformed States can only be won if the democratisation process and economic restructuring are accompanied by social measures. Social policy is not just a sort of "repair workshop" for the market economy; it is a cornerstone of the market economic system. It is for this reason that we refer in Germany to the "social market economy". This implies unity between social policy and economic policy and expresses the idea of a social partnership between workers, employers and the State. This partnership is the basis for the social peace of a country.

What is true of the internal structure of an individual country is also true of its external policies. Foreign policy has today – more than ever – to have a social dimension. Conflicts must be solved at their source; and it is quite clear that many conflicts have social origins. Cooperation between labour policy and social policy therefore becomes a strategy to avoid conflict situations. It is an essential element in a new safety and security policy which has to be defined anew. Social foreign policy is – at the same time – world domestic policy. It is a peace policy because it helps to create peace within society.

On the basis of this premise, the Federal Republic of Germany has given its support to the democratisation process in its neighbouring Eastern countries. Expenditure resulting from reunification as well as that provided to Central, Eastern and Southern Europe has amounted to DM90 billion – of which DM60 billion has been earmarked to countries in the former Soviet Union – since 1990. We feel we have particular responsibility for the States undergoing reform and the Federal Republic has therefore provided more than half of all western support to the former Soviet Union and one-third of western help to countries in the grip of reforms.

Working people who claimed freedom and democracy in 1953 in East Berlin, in 1956 in Budapest, in 1970 in Danzig, and in 1989 and 1990 in many countries of Central and Eastern Europe – and last August on the streets of Moscow – have finally won freedom for themselves and are entitled to solidarity from the community of States. They went on to the streets to fight for democratic and political rights. They went on to the streets to fight for democratic and political rights. They simply wanted what are the basic human rights for the ILO: freedom of opinion, trade union rights and democratisation.

In his Report, the Director-General has linked his basic theme to a further subject which deserves our full attention: the campaign against the evil of child labour. Every democratic society subscribes to the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, thus to the elimination of child labour. But child labour remains a serious world-wide problem – a problem compounded by the fact that we do not know the exact number of working children.

A publication issued by the International Labour Office in 1986 admitted that nobody knew the exact number of working children. Not because of a lack of interest but, inter alia, because children were often statistically hidden. It added that many governments and employers denied the fact they even existed. They did not exist everywhere, but nearly all assessments talked of at least 100 million working children: the report claimed that there could just as easily be a figure of 200 million children.

I am happy that – with the appropriate financial contribution from the Federal Republic of Germany – we have managed here, within the ILO, to elaborate and implement a programme which – based on specific projects to combat child labour – is being carried out in cooperation with the countries concerned.

I would like to take this opportunity to call on all delegates to support this programme at home and to pass on information about this programme in their own capitals. My appeal is directed to all Government delegates. They are asked to provide – whenever possible – financial or technical assistance to this programme and to support any viable projects and measures – as well as to use their authority to implement this programme.

Children often work in the most dangerous places: in mines, in firework factories or in the glass industry. It would be an enormous contribution towards human rights if children could be protected from such conditions.

A last point; although the former antagonisms between East and West have disappeared at a dramatic rate, we are now seeing new dangers emerging in Europe. On the one side, national frontiers are less divisive because of the dynamic of the European unification process and the reunification of Germany. On the other hand, we are seeing depressing examples of national feuds and wars. Under the blanket of imposed harmony, explosive situations have been able to develop. Often social conflicts are the persistent accompaniment to national confrontations. The ILO can and must play the role of a mediator within its own mandate to promote social peace.

The highly industrialised countries are not islands. Civil wars, famine, ecological disasters, or quite simply the economic, social and ecological gulf between West and East and North and South have contributed to the emergence of streams of migrants. Such flows of migrants entail enormous risks, not only for general well-being but also for safety, peace and democracy. For example, the Club of Rome, in its most recent report, believes that because of demographic pressure, the lack of opportunities in Eastern Europe and in developing countries, there will be flows of migrants which will no longer be able to be contained.

Therefore it is more true today than ever before to take into account the old Roman principle that if you wish to have peace, you must foster justice. In order to achieve this the countries of Central, Eastern and South-East Europe, as well as the developing countries, need our help and solidarity, and also a contribution to justice and democratisation. I hope you will all be able to make a contribution to this.

Original – Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. I would first of all like to congratulate the Officiers of the Conference for their election. I would like to thank the Director-General and the Governing Body and the officials of the ILO for the efforts they have made in order to prepare the reports we are discussing now.

The Director-General has given us a complete analysis in his Report of the question of democratisation, and my Confederation would like to pay tribute to him for the important principles he has put forward. We feel that democracy should not be a pretext for acceding to power. It must be used as a way of bringing about social justice and national development. Also, we are convinced that oppressed peoples can achieve democracy only when they are free of repression and exploitation; free of external forces which impose on them their policies and their plans; free of occupation and racial discrimination; free of foreign companies which have a hold on their economies. This is a world problem and external forces must commit themselves to respecting the rights of peoples and help them to establish the foundations of democracy. We believe that the ILO can play an essential role in this area. It can regulate relations amongst States and also between those States and the multinational companies.

Moreover, if social justice is the primary objective of the ILO, and if the principle of tripartism is one of the essential principles upheld by this Organisation, then the ILO must make sure that it actually safeguards these principles. This Organisation up until now has produced hundreds of documents concerning a wide range of questions. All these instruments aim at improving working conditions, strengthening development and protecting workers' rights. We must say, however, that many governments simply ignore these instruments, and some governments go as far as to consider them as being a precious secret to be hidden from their people. The ILO has to accomplish two tasks here. First of all, it must find ways of obliging member States to adapt their legislation to the principles upheld by the Organisation. Secondly, it must strengthen technical cooperation with States and regions which have the greatest need.

We read the Director-General's Report concerning the ILO's activities. We once again find ourselves obliged to observe that the Arab region, generally speaking, and the workers' organisations of that region in particular, do not fully benefit from the activities of this Organisation. For example, the fellowships and the training courses run by the Turin Centre remain limited with regard to the Arabic language. Arabic is always considered as a language of secondary importance. We do not yet find ourselves in a position where we can make full use of the library and the database. The sums allocated to technical cooperation with Arabic-speaking countries remains below what is required – our share is only 2 per cent of the overall amount spent on cooperation. We have even noticed a decrease in the order of 25 per cent, as compared with the previous years. With regard to the translation into Arabic of documents and studies, our requests have still not been met. We are sorry to have to repeat these comments year after year but, unfortunately, we have not received a satisfactory response to the needs of our region and development process. Therefore, we would like to ask the ILO to strengthen its cooperation with our secretariat and to enhance the consultation process in the interests of our objectives and those of the ILO.

We support the proposed Convention respecting the protection of workers' claims. Our secretariat believes that the proposed Convention now before this Conference is one which could help to protect the interests of workers in the event of the insolvency of their employer, which often occurs in the countries of the Third World. We hope that this proposed Convention will be ratified in the very near future.

Concerning the prevention of industrial disasters, we should note that small enterprises are the general rule in our countries and that the workers in these small enterprises are not always fully aware of safety measures. We hope that the ILO, in cooperation with the trade union organisations and other parties will be able to make workers aware of these matters and help them to cope with disasters in the enterprise and in the neighbouring environment. We hope that the ILO will be able to ensure that employers and governments respect such standards.

With regard to structural adjustment, this is a very complex issue which affects every State, every enterprise and every society. Once again, here, the ILO could provide assistance and advice to trade union organisations, as well as to enterprises, by preparing plans and policies which would make it possible to improve the level of information of workers who participate in the structural adjustment process. Structural adjustment must respond to society's needs. It must create jobs and guarantee progress and development. It should not, in any situation, be imposed or accompanied by conditions dictated by international financial bodies, such as the IMF or the World Bank, because such conditions can only aggravate the problem of the debt level of the State concerned.

The problem of migrant workers continues to be a source of great concern and their situation continues to deteriorate. Migrants who live in Europe suffer from racism; they are the first victims of the economic crisis. Although European Community laws are applied, the situation of these workers is continuing to deteriorate. Some workers in the Gulf region have also been victims of the political situation. They have been deprived of their income and have considerable problems; employment opportunities remain limited and their rights are not guaranteed.

The problem of trade union freedoms gives rise to considerable concern amongst the workers in our countries. In many countries workers' rights are trampled underfoot and workers are submitted to arbitrary detention. Arab workers do not fully enjoy trade union freedoms, freedom of association, the right to collective bargaining, equality of opportunity and treatment. We can see this even in the States Members of the ILO which have accepted the Constitution and the principles upheld by the ILO. We would like to call on these States to respect the rights of the workers and their right to freedom of association, because these rights will be beneficial to their countries and because such rights are the sine qua non for progress and prosperity. We ask for the embargo against Iraq to be lifted because the people of that country are threatened with death and because this embargo has lasted for more than two years now.

We have to wonder about the criteria adopted by the United Nations. The United Nations is no longer playing the role which is incumbent on it. The United Nations has accepted unfounded allegations against two Libyan citizens – and Libya is now, in its turn, being exposed to an embargo which was imposed despite the proposals made by the Jamahiriya and the Arab League. We wonder about the role of the United Nations in the light of aggressive acts committed by Israel against the Arab people and the Lebanese people, as well as the people of the Golan.

Racial discrimination is still rife in South Africa. The people and the workers of that country are still staggering under the weight of a racist regime. Despite the measures that have been adopted, a great deal remains to be done. It is thus incumbent on those people enamoured of freedom and justice to give their support to our brothers who suffer in that region.

Original – Spanish: Mr. BROWN YOUNG (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) – On behalf of the workers of Costa Rica, I congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this session of the Conference.

The history of mankind is a long path, full of upheavals and transformations. Social relations are not a path that is serene and calm; on the contrary, it is full of obstacles and barriers. Intermittently, we see the harmonious development of societies and then, suddenly, something happens to upset everything and set in motion a chain of negative energies which put a brake on social progress towards a more civilised world.

Today, we are witessing one of those eras in history where the world is undergoing another cyclical disturbance. This time it does not involve a military force but, despite the aggressive hyper-development of the weapons industry in some countries, winds are blowing which suggest a substantial reduction in the danger of world conflagration and a nuclear holocaust. But these are times of worsening social and economic inequalities between the nations of the world. Technological overdevelopment and the accumulation of capital are increasingly being concentrated in the hands of a few countries which exercise a world domination in defence of their interests, without heed of the serious consequences of their selfish policy on many other nations of this planet.

As a citizen of a country like Costa Rica in a subcontinent characterised by a poverty of such resources, due to the scourge of foreign debt, the recurrent deterioration in the terms of trade, tax shortages, difficulties with primary production and few possibilities of competing in international markets, as well as other more specific problems mean that we are involved in an unequal struggle. The shortage to which I have referred contrasts with the number of unsatisfied social demands, the reduction of employment and real wages, the smallness of our domestic markets and the civil conflicts which still have to be resolved.

It is at times such as these that our best efforts should be used to find negotiated solutions, without force or prejudice, and with the necessary amount of sacrifice on behalf of those who are most afflicted by the heavy and cold blows of neo-liberalism.

At times like this the workers and the trade unions have to unite their energies and wills to confront seriously and responsibly the alternatives to ensure that justice and social development are the main objective for mankind.

The turbulence which the world is undergoing now has an aftermath which poses a danger to democracy.

Our country, Costa Rica, more than a century ago chose a path towards perfecting its participative, democratic system. This decision resulted in significant events which have shown that the democratic modes and a legitimate commitment to the interests of the people are, without any doubt, the correct path to follow and the legitimate choice for ensuring the well-being of society.

We mention these facts too because we must not forget the reality of history, since some new fanatical liberal trends put things in a calculated manner to confuse people and make them believe that they will, like some invisible hand, conjure all the bad things away and bring a new dawn of wealth, progress and peerless justice.

We owe it to the truth to speak clearly about the Costa Rica that we won, which built its own model, without the benefit of international conventions, inspired by the principles of ordinary normal assistance between sister peoples of the world, cultural and technological exchange, generous aid in the event of emergencies, fair trade and solidarity. This Costa Rica, which has no army, chose by virtue of its civic sense the path of social investment instead of the useless expenditure on the tools of war.

In the same way an exemplary educational system was established, and little-by-little a modern and appropriate welfare programme to protect Costa Rican citizens from the main contingencies which unfortunately continue to be present in any society.

This Costa Rica was won without any plans for structural adjustments imposed without respect for the idiosyncracies of our own country and without consideration for national realities. It was won with political parties which, at different times in history, knew how to interpret the demands of the people to build a State as an ideal instrument for promoting general well-being. It was won with the trade unions of workers who, while firm in claiming their rights, did not through their duties as citizens and contributed, not only through their daily output, but also through their participation, in the civic and political struggle, to further the interests of the country. It was won also with honest employers who knew how to interpret the fact that in society, work is an act which is of permanent respect and concertation and that desire of profit can never justify the exploitation of our fellow men, who alone are the owners of their physical and intellectual work. It was won by intellectual commitment to the most progressive currents of modern thought, which left behind the old and unjust theories on racial discrimination, the violation of freedom, the justification of dictatorship and everything which flouted the basic rights of man.

The Costa Rican trade unions observe with genuine concern what is happening in our country, as in other sister countries, in response to the crisis, namely the generalised application of policies of neo-liberal adjustment of an unrestrained, recessive and concentrated nature, which have resulted from the conditioning of aid and economic assistance programmes, and which have led to an unpardonable loss of national sovereignty since our Governments have been supplanted by superior transnational authorities.

This discouraging picture which we see in our countries is the result of the implacable reign of neo-liberal policies. It is also affecting our trade union movement, which every day sees how urgent it is to ensure the unreserved application of trade union freedoms which are confronted by practices which thwart and restrict the full use of this undeniable right.

A strong trade union movement is more urgent than ever in the present times. We must insist over and over again on the need for the total respect of the guarantees of freedom of association, collective bargaining and the modernisation of the labour law.

The consolidation of genuine tripartism is the correct course to follow to overcome the serious crisis to which our underdeveloped countries are being subjected and to achieve more advanced degrees of genuine social cooperation.

At the same time there is also an urgent need to avoid widening the gap between the many poor countries and the few rich countries and in this respect it is absolutely necessary to state here that while the hoped for processes of the transfer of modern technologies are being accomplished, and economies find their rightful place within the international context, underdeveloped countries should be guaranteed a more just treatment in the prices of their products, and in particular, agricultural products. The violent distortion of the terms of trade must be corrected to compensate for the accumulated effects of all the years that have passed.

There is likewise no doubt that in the transitional phase towards freer international trade, it will be necessary to regulate the protectionism of the industrialised countries, which leave few options for economic development to the underdeveloped countries. The most recent case is the restrictive policy for selling our banana production to the European countries; that more than suffices to show that we are far from receiving just treatment, and that the opening up of trade is simply an argument to favour the exclusive interest of the large transnational, industrial and financial companies.

The UNDP in its annual report for 1991 on human development stressed that rather than a lack of financial resources, it is the absence of political commitment which is the real reason for the lack of attention given to the basic needs of modern man. We share this view, since the practice of social dumping appears to be the common denominator in international economic relations today. In the final analysis such a practice is the exploitation, without any reason or moral justification, of the assets of poor countries and their transfer to the privileged and rich countries.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. RITA (Workers' delegate, Sao Tome and Principe) – It is a great honour for me to take the floor on behalf of the workers belonging to the independent trade unions in Sao Tome and Principe who, for the first time, are represented in this prestigious Organisation. I am very proud to be able to greet you on this occasion on behalf of the Workers of the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe. May I congratulate the President on his election to preside over the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference. This is evidence of the confidence and the prestige that he has earned through his work in his own country as well as in the ILO. We know that the Conference can count on his leadership to ensure the success of its debates, although it is a difficult task we have entrusted to him.

I would also like to congratulate Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, on the wealth of information in the Report he has submitted to this Conference.

We believe deeply in the growing capacity of the ILO to achieve its lofty goals.

The Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe is today taking its first steps in the realm of democracy with a view to dealing firmly with the consequences of a single-party regime and setting down the basis for genuine development.

Allow me to refer to the process begun in our country since 1990 with a view to improving the general well-being of the population in general, and the workers in particular. Within this context, with a wide-ranging human dimension, in Sao Tome and Principe we are analysing all the problems arising in connection with work and working conditions and formulas for sharing the benefits from such work.

Without pretending in any way to make history since we achieved independence on 12 July 1975, the people of Sao Tome and Principe and particularly its workers have been attempting to give themselves the means of exercising their democratic prerogatives. They are also trying to find a way of bringing about economic, social and cultural development with a view to making progress in the standard of living of the population.

Sixteen years have passed, and the outlook for the citizens of my country has grown gloomier. The price of cocoa, our main export, has fallen considerably and the income from its export is not sufficient to cover even the interest on our debt. The population is growing and the standard of living in general, and in the rural sectors in particular, is deteriorating at top speed; health conditions are deteriorating due to inadequate maintenance. All these factors have a negative effect on the life of workers in my country, and the exodus from rural areas to the towns has worsened the situation.

The national assembly has been working on legislation on individual employment relations, strikes and other trade union matters. These legal instruments open up new prospects for all the workers of my country by creating conditions which will help us to resolve our problems freely.

It is necessary to carry out reforms to guarantee democracy in Sao Tome and Principe and it is important to stress the need to ratify Convention No. 87. In this connection, I call on the ILO from this rostrum, in the name of the workers of the Democratic Republic of Sao Tome and Principe, to assist the Government to take the following measures.

To ensure that the workers are satisfactorily organised, it is necessary to set up independent trade unions, and we suggest that the following unions need to be set up. Independent unions for agricultural workers, construction workers, workers in industry and energy and teachers. These unions will continue their activities independently of the political forces in the same way as religious organisations. Their major objectives will be to defend democracy and the fundamental rights and freedoms of their members and of workers, as well as trade union unity, social insurance, employment, vocational training, etc. The result of this trade union action will depend largely on trade union unity, and it is therefore logical that an essential trade union confederation will need to be set up. In this connection, an advisory committee of independent unions has been set up, which I have the honour to chair, to make preparations for a constituent assembly for an independent trade union confederation.

This is not an easy task because we have so few means at our disposal. It is important to stress the need for training of trade union officials and we call on the ILO for help in this connection.

In conclusion, may I extend greetings once again to the President, and to the workers here present, because it is important that we should establish links of cooperation and friendship with other trade unions represented here.

Original – Russian: Mr. KUNYAVSKY (Employers' delegate, Belarus) – Firstly, I should like to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to this lofty post and I wish him every success in guiding this the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference to a fruitful conclusion. I should also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents.

For the second time in succession, this august forum has allowed the representative of an independent democratic organisation of employers from a sovereign member of the world community – the Republic of Belarus – to take the floor. The entrepreneurial sector, which in our country covers all those individual and collective producers outside direct State ownership, is now developing intensively. In 1991, the number of members of our union alone more than doubled, and they accounted for approximately 10 per cent of the gross domestic product of the Republic. Please bear in mind that I am talking now about a country where some three or four years ago entrepreneurship was one of the activities covered by criminal code.

The main reason why entrepreneurship is, with every passing year, becoming an ever stronger social and economic and even political structure in Belarus lies in the development of the democratic process in the Republic. It is precisely the political democratisation of the entire system of social relationships in the Republic which is the alma mater of entrepreneurship and indeed of many other progressive developments. This new state of affairs has been grasped and assimilated by all my fellow countrymen have become or are becoming entrepreneurs. This explains why employers and their associations are the most consistent supporters of democratic reforms, this is why we were so pleased with and interested in the Report of the Director-General Democratisation and the ILO and why we feel that it is first and foremost through comprehensive support to enterprise and entrepreneurs and through implementation of work in this area that the ILO could be most effective in consolidating and promoting democracy.

We see the Director-General's Report as very profound, comprehensive and topical. It is striking because of the masterful philosophical definition in the Report of the concept and process of democracy and the conditions and factors for its establishment and consolidation, and regional specificities. We agree with the section of the Report which states that no country on our planet has a perfect democracy and that all countries are still working towards democracy, although the degree to which certain countries have progressed in the right direction can clearly be seen.

Michel Hansenne's Report very rightly points out that many countries which have embarked upon the path of democratisation and the creation of market economies have encountered enormous social and economic difficulties and problems and are experiencing a social and economic crisis which constitutes, today, our of the most tangible threats to what is still democracy in its infancy. For my Republic this situation holds true – and is aggravated by two factors: firstly, the billions being poured into attenuating the problems of the disaster at the Chernobyl atomic power station will now have to be paid by our people alone and met by our economy. In this regard, I should like to take this opportunity to express the gratitude of the people of Belarus to all those who have given and are giving us both national and moral support in coping with this disaster. Secondly, we have inherited from the totalitarian regime a production system under which our economy is chained to traditional raw materials supplies and the traditional markets for goods and capital of the former Soviet Union.

In the former Soviet Union, these two facts alone make it crucially important for us to achieve speedier restructuring of the economy and greater economic efficiency. This is why both the Government and the employers are anxious to open our economy and to quickly adopt all market mechanisms. But let me make it quite clear that we see these mechanisms not in general abstract terms but rather in the context of our own circumstances and our social, economic, historical, national and cultural characteristics. The solution of these problems is the guarantee that democracy will be strengthened and developed in our country, and we would be very happy if the ILO, with its great authority and competence, could assist us.

In my Republic, thanks greatly to the work of employers' associations, both the Parliament and the Government have a clear understanding of the importance of developing entrepreneurial endeavours and the part they should play in restructuring the economy, attracting foreign investment and improving productivity. Thanks to this understanding we have been able to prepare a comprehensive state programme to support such endeavours for the next five years. This programme gives high priority to the development of enterpreneurial endeavours and the preparation of a set of draft laws and other statutory instruments to promote and support such activities and to provide financial, material and manpower support, with a view to creating new jobs and providing social protection for workers. In developing the programme, wide use has been made of ILO documents, materials and project and of the experiences of other countries. We would be very grateful if ILO specialists could participate directly, reviewing this programme with us and could give advice when it is being implemented.

We have noted with great satisfaction the passage in the Director-General's Report to the effect that the ILO in its programme and budget for 1992-93 is allocating considerable resources to the developments of enterprise and entrepreneurship – in particular, in the interests of small enterprises. Unfortunately, we could not find any indication as to whether this programme and budget would also cover the enterprises of Belarus.

As the representatives of the Government and workers of my country have already said, Belarus this year established a tripartite mechanism of consultation and partnership for the first time. This was our first attempt, and we will have to make improvements. The Director-General's Report quite rightly notes that in the former centrally planned economy countries, the process of forming employer' and entrepreneurs' organisations is not yet complete. The State has not yet given them the powers they need to operate in a free economy. This is true in the case of Belarus too. That is why we welcome the International Labour Organisation's plan to extend its activities to support employers' organisations by strengthening their structures so that they can participate effectively in the system of tripartite representation and so that their Members can receive any assistance they require.

In view of the great importance of this issue for my Republic and for all countries of the former USSR and of Central and Eastern Europe, I proposed that the International Labour Organisation should hold in Minsk, the capital of Belarus, an international seminar on the establishment and development of entrepreneurs' organisations in countries building a market economy. My association, the Union of Leaseholders and Entrepreneurs of Belarus, would be very happy to participate in the preparation of such a seminar and to do everything possible to ensure that it is useful for all its participants. We appeal to you to support this proposal.

In conclusion we should like to express our gratitude to the administration of the ILO for creating the best possible conditions for our work, and we would like to appeal to employers' organisations throughout the world to cooperate with us for the good of all our peoples.

Original - French: Mrs. DE VITS (Workers' delegate, Belgium) – Although it has not yet been accepted everywhere, far from it, the need for political democracy is becoming more and more a universal phenomenon. In fact political democracy is being less and less considered as another form of relationship between the government and the governed but more as a guarantee of the value of these relationships. That is to say, fewer and fewer countries are now challenging the values which underlie political democracy, either for reasons of State or in the cause of evicting the exploiting class, or else in the struggle against communism.

As the Director-General has said in his Report, political democracy has seen a gradual extension from southern Europe, around 1975, to Latin America, then to central and eastern Europe and is now even asserting itself in Africa and Asia. Recent years have seen a certain advance by democracy. We are full of hope. The last decade of the twentieth century could lay down the foundations for a world democratic order for the new millennium.

Let us not give way to triumphalism. It would be wrong to believe that political democracy has been achieved by the virtue of its geographical extension. For hope to become reality, many things have to change. Nothing can be taken for granted. And there are four main reasons.

Anti-democratic forces and ideologies do not lower their guard, even in states which have a long democratic tradition. Think of the revival of fascism.

The transition by eastern countries towards what we hope will be democracy often follows a path which has very little in common with democracy. There are often violations of trade union freedoms, old scores are settled with the communists, with exclusion of citizens who participated in the old regime.

Moreover, the blind faith which new leaders have in the market forces creates social injustice today and paves the way for massive exclusion tomorrow.

So what can we find in this new order which we say is balanced, in Latin America where minimum wages in real terms have dropped by an average of 25 per cent during the 1980s, in Africa, where the standard of living for most of the continent has been reduced to that which prevailed in 1960, in Asia where poverty is still the lot of hundreds of thousands of people in the slums?

Or in western Europe, or in North America where 10 to 15 per cent of the population live in poverty because of unemployment, feeble employment growth and cuts in the social security systems, while at the same time they feel the effects of increasing racism and xenophobia resulting from these uncontrolled developments?

This means that many citizens do not yet enjoy or no longer enjoy the impact of political democracy. Practically excluded from the world of labour, from culture, knowledge, information, or completely excluded, these victims of inequality are also thrust away from political democracy.

In other words, if we consider that all citizens have the imprescriptible right to enjoy political democracy and to participate in the democratic process, then we must add one value, one precondition for the realisation of political democracy: the implementation of policies to erase inequalities. To fight against inequalities is in effect to create social and economic conditions for the exercise of democratic freedoms by the majority. On this point you will agree that international consensus is much smaller than on other values upheld by political democracy. In fact, insistence on the principle of combating inequality automatically strengthens the role of the State in building economic and social democracy.

This cannot of course satisfy those who identify democracy with the exclusion of the State in favour of a free market. On the other hand, the reinforcement of the State's role is fundamental to those who consider that democracy comprises a dual imperative: the bringing about of political democracy and of economic and social democracy.

In fact, if the approach towards a market economy can be considered economically desirable, it must be realised that this creates permanent accumulations of economic power and areas of inequality. The market economy must therefore be backed up with a solid public sector, a balanced and efficient fiscal system and a good social security system.

Democracy must assert itself in these areas by means of political choices, which will also permit active participation by the people. This is an essential challenge because there is an evident lack of involvement in the democratic process even by those in countries where there is a long tradition of consultation.

A certain lack of interest in the political challenges of our times with regard to political parties, elections, and trade union organisations, and a certain fatalistic scepticism with regard to any possibility of changing things, indicate that our society consumes more democracy than it creates.

How can the ILO contribute to the creation of democracy? We have to consider the specific nature of the ILO as compared with other international organisations which act on behalf of democracy.

The ILO is distinguished by its tripartite character. It is therefore by creating economic and social democracy that the ILO can best assert itself.

The real needs of local populations must constitute a leitmotif in the development process. This requires consultation with those concerned, in industrialised countries as well as in less-developed countries. The social partners in the industrialised countries have considerable experience to share. Cannot the ILO then make a positive contribution towards the insertion of social clauses in international, commercial agreements? Should we not be studying the possibility of adopting a Convention on the need to respect human rights, workers' rights and trade union rights when international, commercial agreements are concluded?

Finally, the ILO has a role to play vis-à-vis other international institutions. We must encourage institutions such as the IMF not to promote or impose austerity policies on the weakest States. Such austerity policies lead to further weakening of the poorest States and, as a direct consequence, to the weakening and impoverishment of already disadvantaged people.

Yes, the world may be at a crossroads in its history, as the Report points out. Immense efforts are required, in particular to turn the world in the right direction, towards structural reforms in North-South economic relationships, towards the strengthening of democratic rights, towards the elimination of poverty and towards peace.

Mr. SANDRASEKERA (Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka) – First of all I would like to convey to the Conference fraternal greetings from my own organisation, the Ceylon Workers' Congress, and the other two organisations which are representative of the workers of Sri Lanka, the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union and the JSS.

Having said that, I will join the other speakers before me in felicitating the President on his election to the high office of President of this session of the Conference. I have no doubt that his experience and expertise in the spectrum of labour relations will make a significant contribution to the success of the deliberations of this of session. After saying that, it would be remiss on my part if I did not congratulate the Director-General on the excellent Report and other documentation that has been placed for the consideration of the Conference.

As the Director-General has very succinctly highlighted in the document on democratisation, this session is taking place against the backdrop of a spectacular and dramatic change in the political climate of the world. Totalitarian and authoritarian systems have collapsed, as they have not been able to bring into realisation the expectations of the people.

However, there has not been an orderly and peaceful transformation to a democratic system of society. There has been a surge of expression, tragic in dimension, to forge identities along ethnic lines which has made the path to democracy a painful process.

Nevertheless, as the Director-General states in his Special Report on the application of the Declaration concerning action against apartheid in South Africa, action spearheaded by the ILO, the international trade union movement and the United Nations system have succeeded in creating the momentum for the eventual demolition of the apartheid system in South Africa, which however calls for the continuation of sustained international pressure for the establishment of majority rule in that country.

It is in this context that account must be taken of the greater role that the United Nations system and the international free trade union movement ought to play in restructuring some of the governing systems in countries which persist in maintaining social and political conditions that are in flagrant conflict with the principles enshrined in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, i.e. freedom of association and the freedom of speech.

The progress made towards adopting a Convention and Recommendation respecting the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer has assumed far greater importance than when this subject was first mooted.

Almost as a corollary to the collapse of the authoritarian system there has been a pervasive drive to introduce structural adjustment policies, particularly in developing countries like in my own country, Sri Lanka, to liberalise the economy and deregulate, with the Government plying a regulatory rather than the dominant role in the structure of the economy.

The privatisation formula presupposes the fact that private enterprise has the capacity and the know-how to manage its own areas of interest in a manner far superior to that of the State. This proposition to my mind is a contradiction in terms. For instance, if private sector management is credited with such a degree of efficiency, there is no explanation for corporate failures that are taking place with such regularity.

Nevertheless, it is having regard to this reality that an international instrument providing for the protection of workers' claims in the event of the insolvency of the employer must receive priority attention of a wide enough reach to cover the new elements that have surfaced.

On the other hand, one may question as to how the contradiction between privatisation and insolvency of private sector employers could be reconciled. In this direction I would like to make a reference to what is taking place in Sri Lanka in this regard.

Privatisation of public enterprise in my country is taking place on a two-pronged system. Peopolisation, as it is called, of the state sector has been implemented with the transfer of 10 per cent of the shares of the enterprise free of cost to the workers in the particular enterprise, thus paving the way for participatory managment.

In so far as the plantation sector is concerned, this being the greatest single labour-intensive industry, employing nearly 1 million workers, privatisation takes a different form from that applied in the other sectors of the economy.

My union, the Ceylon Workers' Congress, whose President is Bvo. Jhondaman, has been supportive of the privatisation of the plantation industry on the modality that the State will retain ownership of the property and only the management aspect of it would be handed over to private companies. At the same time, my union has obtained a written guarantee from the Government that not a single worker would be displaced or laid off on account of privatisation and that all industrial practices and terms and conditions of employment would continue to be maintained as when the plantations were under the management of State-sponsored agencies.

Very importantly, we have been able to obtain a commitment that as part of the privatisation process, the administration and the social welfare aspects of the workers, including their residential quarters, would be delinked from each other. In other words, we have been able to come to an arrangement that the administration of the living quarters of the workers and their appurtenant land would be vested in the workers occupying such quarters, for which special bodies or trusts would be set up.

In other words, we have ensured that notwithstanding the privatisation of managment, the State would continue to be the guarantor of the terms and conditions of employment of the workers involved.

Furthermore, the companies that are to be involved in the management of plantations are required to enter into collective agreements with the respective representative workers' organisations.

We are, however, quite aware of the fact that incentives to collective bargaining should not detract from the new dangers that exclusive bilateral relations between labour and management could pose in the long run.

The momentum generated by structural adjustment programmes could lead governments in both developed and developing countries to sideline the importance of third-party intervention and tripartite arrangements. Coming under attack would be protective legislation providing job security, industrial adjudication, etc.

These trends call for the trade union movement to be vigilant that new modes of economic management are not made a cover to eat into the rights and privileges of the workers.

Such a situation also means that the ILO must strengthen its supervisory role in respect of the observance of international labour standards and realign its workers' education strategy to ensure that tripartism within structural adjustment programmes continues to be relevant and vibrant as a prerequisite for social equilibrium.

In other words, the social cataclysm that the world is going through poses a challenge of no mean magnitude to the social partners, and the international labour standards enunciated by the International Labour Conference will continue to constitute the bulwark against exploitation of the workers and the suppression of individual and collective freedoms.

The quintessence of efficient management is rationalisation and the elimination of waste. The whole process calls for the training and retraining of not only the manpower that may be displaced, but also the manpower needed to respond to labour market requirements.

Human resources development in this context requires not only primacy but also immediacy. The document prepared by the Director-General encaptures the gamut of the issues involved in this regard. In Sri Lanka we have set up a Tripartite Tertiary Vocational Education Commission, the task of which is to coordinate manpower resources development actvities, lay down guidelines for curricula, and respond to labour market requirements.

The educational actions undertaken by the ILO, while being of immense benefit, will no doubt now sharpen the focus on issues that are a spin-off from structural adjustment programmes that are current and the problems that come in the wake of such adjustments.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MUGALLA) – I would like to give the floor to Mrs. Abbas, Government adviser, Indonesia, who wishes to exercise her right of reply concerning the speech of Mr. Tiago Gomes, Employers' delegate, Angola.

But before I give her the floor, I wish to point out that the reply should refer only to the point under debate. It should be brief, not exceed two minutes, and should not give rise to any further remarks.

Lastly, it should be worded in correct and parliamentary language. Furthermore, I wish to point out that in order to avoid endless debates, it has been a pratice of the Presidents to refuse to allow replies to a reply.

Mrs. ABBAS (Government adviser, Indonesia) – The Employers' delegate of Angola, in his statement this morning,has made a reference to what he termed the "suppression of self-determination of East Timor". It is the opinion of the Government delegation of Indonesia that such a reference is clearly outside the points under discussion. The reference shows a total disregard for the President's own guidance at the second sitting for the smooth proceedings of the Conference and therefore should have been ruled out by the Chair.

Notwithstanding the procedural aspect, to strengthen the record, let me state that the process of self-determination of East Timor was completed when the people of East Timor decided in 1975 to break the chains of centuries of colonialism and opted for independence through integration with Indonesia. Moreover, in view of over 17 years of civil war, that devastated their country, following the disorderly process of decolonisation, perhaps it would have been more appropriate for the Employers' delegate of Angola to address questions relating to self-determination to themselves.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.45 p.m.)

Fourteenth sitting

Thursday, 11 June 1992, 10.15 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues and Mr. Solórzano Martinez

SIXTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda this morning is the sixth report of the Selection Committee, which you have in Provisional Record No. 6E. This report, submitted by the Chairman of the Selection Committee, contains only some changes in the composition of the Committees. If there are no objections, I consider this report as adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

FIRST REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the report of the Credentials Committee.

I give the floor to Mr. Pérez del Castillo, Government delegate, Uruguay, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Original – Spanish: Mr. PEREZ DEL CASTILLO (Government delegate, Uruguay; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Credentials Committee, which is found in Provisional Record No. 10. The report sets out the composition of the Conference and the quorum at 4 June, when the Committee drew up its report.

Since then a number of delegates and advisers have been accredited. Benin, Central African Republic, Dominica, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia and Moldova have accredited their delegations to the Conference, bringing the total number of States present to 151.

The report also refers to incomplete delegations and the implications of this on the right to vote. Albania, Kyrgyzstan, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone and Sudan have not accredited Employers' delegates. The delegations of Comoros, Equatorial Guinea, Somalia and Viet Nam consist only of Government delegates. The same is true of Dominica, Liberia and Moldova. Cameroon, also mentioned in the report in this connection, has now sent a full tripartite delegation, and Chad has accredited a Workers' delegate. Since the report was produced Antigua and Barbuda have recovered their right to vote.

The Committee would like to remind governments of their obligation under article 3 of the Constitution to send a full tripartite delegation to the Conference.

The Committee has also noted a certain imbalance between the number of advisers accompanying the delegates of each group, and in particular between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. In this connection, it urges governments, when appointing delegations, to have due regard for the proportion in the composition of the Conference, as envisaged in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution.

Moreover, the Committee further reiterates the request contained in the resolution on the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the ILO, adopted by the Conference at its 56th Session in 1971.

In this connection, the Committee reminds member States of the observations under article 13, paragraph (2) (a) of the Constitution to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the session of the Conference.

I would also like to draw your attention to the information contained in paragraph 7 of the report concerning the number of women among accredited delegates and advisers. This information was included in the report in pursuance of the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in 1981.

The Committee wishes to point out that its work and that of the Conference would be made easier if credentials could be sent to the Office within the time-limit laid down in article 26, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders, and if all governments would use the appropriate form enclosed with the Memorandum sent to governments before the session of the Conference.

In particular, it would be useful for governments to provide precise information on the employers' and workers' organisations consulted on the appointment of Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers, as well as on the organisations which have agreed to these appointments.

Since the report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, the Conference is required only to take note of it.

We held our meetings in an atmosphere of understanding and goodwill with the valuable help of the Office as usual.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Since the report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, I invite the Conference to take note of it. I should like to thank the Chairman and the officers of the Committee for the excellent report that they have presented to us.

(The report is noted.)

First report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives: Submission and adoption

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

I should like to ask Mr. Tayo Fashoyin, Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, to submit the report.

Mr. FASHOYIN (Special Assistant to the Minister of Labour and Productivity, Nigeria; Chairman and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

This report, circulated as Provisional Record No. 11, contains the Committee's recommendations on the matters that were placed before it for consideration. The resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference in respect of these items appear at the end of the report.

The first item before the Committee was a request from Paraguay for the right to vote. You may recall that the 1991 Session of the Conference granted Paraguay the right to vote and approved an arrangement concerning the settlement of its arrears. Unfortunately, because of adverse exchange rate movements, the payments made up to 31 December 1991 fell just short of the amount needing to be paid in 1991 under the arrangement and Paraguay lost the right to vote on 1 January 1992. Paraguay made a payment which covered the 1991 shortfall on 13 January 1992 and has since made payments that cover all of its 1992 obligations and part of its 1993 obligations. The Committee expressed its full support for Paraguay's application, and the resolution for the granting of permission to vote will be found at the end of the report.

The Committee also adopted for submission to the Conference a resolution concerning appointments to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pension Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee. Resolutions were also adopted concerning the statute and composition of the Administrative Tribunal and the rates of assessment in 1992 for the Republic of Korea and for Viet Nam.

The Committee is also submitting a resolution concerning six new member States for which rates of assessment have not yet been established in the United Nations (Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia) and is proposing to the Conference for adoption a draft scale of assessment for 1993. The scale is included in Appendix I, and, in accordance with normal practice, is based on that of the United Nations, adjusted for differences in membership. Both of these resolutions take account of the possibility of there being further new member States of the ILO in a similar position to the six States mentioned for which rates of assessments have not yet been established in the United Nations. In fact, one such State, the Republic of Moldova, joined the ILO on 8 June 1992, after the Finance Committee had finished its work, and will accordingly be treated in a manner similar to that of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia and Lithuania.

The next matter considered by the Finance Committee concerned the Working Capital Fund. The resolution which the Committee adopted for submission to the Conference includes proposals for amendments to the Financial Regulations, and these are contained in Appendix III.

The Committee also considered the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91, and recommends them to the Conference for adoption.

The last item considered by the Committee was the treatment of the 1990-91 cash surplus. The Committee agreed to the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning appropriations from this surplus, as described in Appendix II, and to a transfer of 2 million Swiss francs to the Building and Accommodation Fund. This will still leave a refund to member States of the remainder of the cash surplus, amounting to just over 7 million Swiss francs.

On the assumption that all the foregoing resolutions are adopted by the Conference, Appendix I shows the amounts due from member States for 1993.

In conclusion, I would like to express my thanks to the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. W. Dejong, Government delegate of Australia, to all the members of the Committee for their participation in the work of the Committee, and to the members of the secretariat, all of whom helped me greatly in my task as Chairman.

I commend all these resolutions to the Conference for adoption and I hope you will give them your unanimous support.

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – The report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives is now before the Conference. I should like to know if anyone wishes to take the floor. Obviously not.

We now go on to the adoption of the report, that is to say the entire report, paragraphs 1 to 67, together with the ten resolutions at the end of the report and Appendices I, II and III. I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report, paragraphs 1 to 67, is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the granting to Paraguay of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the adoption of the resolution granting Paraguay permission to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO. The adoption of this resolution requires a two-thirds majority vote. In accordance with article 19, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, this vote should be a record vote.

However, we consider that the delay in Paraguay's contributions did not exceed more than a few days, Yesterday I submitted to the Conference on behalf of the Officers and in accordance with article 76 of the Standing Orders a unanimous proposal aimed at suspending article 19, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders concerning this resolution, and proposed that we adopt it by consensus.

If there are no objections I take it that this proposal is adopted.

(The proposal is adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We now move to the adoption of the resolution itself. If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning appointments to the Administrative Board (ILO Staff Pensions Fund) and the ILO Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pensions Board)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we move on to the resolution relating to the appointments to the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund and the ILO Staff Pension Committee of the United Nations Joint Staff Pensions Board.

May I consider this resolution as adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that this resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the contributions of the Republic of Korea

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the contributions of the Republic of Korea.

If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the contributions of Viet Nam

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the contributions of Viet Nam.

If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the contributions of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia, and the scale of assessment of contributions for 1993

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the contributions of Azerbaijan, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania and Slovenia.

If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund and proposals to amend the Financial Regulations

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have resolution concerning the operation of the Working Capital Fund and proposals to amend the Financial Regulations.

If there are no objections, I shall consider this resolution adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – Next we have the resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1990-91.

If there are no objections, may I consider this resolution adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

Resolution concerning the treatment of the 1990-91 cash surplus

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – And finally, we have the resolution concerning the treatment of the 1990-91 cash surplus.

If there are no objections, may I consider this resolution adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

(The report, the ten resolutions and Appendices I, II and III are adopted.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – All of the resolutions have been adopted.

I should like to thank the Chairman and Vice-Chairmen and members of the Committee for their excellent work.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original – Portuguese: The PRESIDENT – We will now continue our discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CORTAZAR SANZ (Minister for Labour and Social Welfare, Chile) – I would like to congratulate Mr. Nascimento Rodrigues on his election to the Presidency of the International Labour Conference. I would like to refer to certain aspects of the Director-General's Report which relate to the possibilities and challenges involved in democratisation. This is a fundamental subject both for Chile and for many other countries in the world, which today are full of hope about their newly attained freedom.

We echo his words of optimism and hope about the progress that is being made in vast regions of the world and in our own Latin America by democracy and its institutions which constitute an irreplaceable safeguard for political freedom and the respect of human rights.

As stressed by the Director-General in his Report, this quest for democracy is accompanied by the aspiration of our peoples to achieve development and modernisation. Not an exclusive form of modernisation, or one benefiting just a minority, but a form of modernisation which ensures justice. Not an exclusive form of modernisation, but one which is built up with the participation of everybody concerned.

Our Government shares this vision of development and democratisation. Today should not simply be the advent of freedom. It should also be the advent of modernisation, with justice and participation.

In the past few years in Chile, we have been rebuilding our democratic institutions. We have made substantial progress with national reconciliation. We have based our co-existence on the law and on mutual respect.

At the same time we have taken significant steps forward along the path of modernisation. Modernisation for the people and with the people.

Significant progress has been made with regard to development and modernisation. The new Chilean democracy has succeeded in being efficient in pursuing its goals of growth and stability. Last year, GNP grew by about 6 per cent and this year we expect it to do the same. Investment has increased. This year inflation will be about 15 per cent which is about half of what it was when President Aylwin took office.

But progress has not only been made in respect of modernisation. We have also taken significant steps forward as concerns our goal and our challenge: modernisation for the people and with the people.

Modernisation for the people means building a fairer society. The main contribution to this has been the enormous progress made in generating employment. Today, our unemployment rate is below 5 per cent, the lowest it has been in 19 years. In the first two years of democratic government, minimum wages increased their purchasing power by about 20 per cent, while average wages increased theirs by 7 per cent. The purchasing power of pensions rose over the same period by over 10 per cent. State expenditure on health, education, housing and social security increased by about 30 per cent.

We have reformed our labour legislation in regard to the termination of employment contracts and the provisions concerning trade union organisations and collective bargaining. The Senate is now considering the final bill which will complete the process of fully reforming the Labour Code. This reform will bring our labour legislation up to date, it will bring it into line with international standards, it will create greater justice, and it will allow greater participation.

At the same time we have increased the machinery for supervising enforcement of the labour laws, increasing the staff available for that purpose by about 30 per cent, as well as increasing the resources of the National Labour Department.

All these are concrete results in the process of modernisation for the people.

But they do not suffice. The goal is to achieve modernisation for the people and with the people. Only in this way can we create the social consensus necessary to make modernisation a steady process, with complete social legitimacy, which can be sustained over a long period of time.

Modernisation with the people presupposes allowances being made for social participation. A significant step in this direction was the national tripartite agreements concluded with the main trade union confederations and employers' organisations in the country. In these agreements we have not only set out our views about the challenges of democracy and development. We have also agreed on the adjustments that need to be made to minimum wages and other social benefits. In April 1990, a few weeks after our return to democracy, the first of these national tripartite agreements was signed. Never before in the history of our country had there been a national agreement of this kind. In April this year, we signed an agreement for the third year running. And we took an additional step. We set up a permanent tripartite body to deal with a series of topics of mutual interest for the government, the employers and the workers.

In this connection, I should like to stress that in the past few days the National Congress approved the proposal made by the Government to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

I should also like to mention the annual agreements between the Government and workers in the public sector. To provide support for this participation process, we recently submitted to Parliament a bill recognising the right of association of workers in the public sector, and providing for the necessary exemptions, permits and authority to enable their organisations to become efficient instruments of representation and participation.

We are living a very special moment in the history of Chile, in the history of Latin America and in the history of mankind. We are at a stage which gives us the right to be optimistic: a stage which demands of all of us consistency in our conduct, clarity in our convictions and awareness of the challenge facing us – political democracy, modernisation for the people and with the people. This is our goal. This is our challenge. This is the path we have chosen.

Original – French: Mr. GOSSELIN (Secretary-General of the International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers) – I would like first of all to thank the President for allowing me to replace Mr. Janssens, President of our organisation – of which I am the Secretary-General. On behalf of the International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers affiliated to the World Confederation of Labour, I should like to say how grateful we are to the ILO for providing us with the opportunity of taking the floor and addressing this Assembly – and the Director-General – so that we might submit our point of view.

Our organisation has the same, and adheres to, the same values and principles as those of the ILO: the respect of basic human rights and social justice. This aim to promote a more human and prosperous society is reflected in all the action undertaken and described in the Report of the Director-General. As the Director-General has said, it is even more important not to lose sight of this aim today, now that there [illegible] so many political and economic upheavals throughout the world. We are also convinced that this Conference will lead to a general consensus, thus demonstrating the usefulness of services the ILO provides to its constituents.

The trade union movement attaches great importance to and is particularly interested in civil and political freedoms, democracy and social and economic justice. Governments which are not ready to ensure and guarantee the respect of these principles for their people can scarcely aspire to democracy. History and today's experience have shown that the violation of human rights and fundamental union rights is still commonplace in a large number of countries.

We can quote the example of Morocco, where a union leader was recently sentenced to imprisonment and where demonstrations of 1 May are banned. The ILO has a privileged role to play in so far as it can intervene to ensure that standards pertaining to creedom of association are not trampled underfoot. We therefore would like to invite the ILO to strengthen its action in this area.

I should also like to express our appreciation for the number of initiatives taken by the ILO in structural adjustment. It is essential that the programme established in this area, which aims at strengthening the capacity of countries to draw up and apply policies and programmes to create jobs and reduce poverty, this should be pursued in cooperation with other United Nations agencies.

As an organisation, we do our best, through training, to make union leaders aware of the need and the importance for both sides of trade and industry to be very attentive to and follow the development of governmental actions. We are also happy to be able to count on the aid and assistance of the ILO services.

We should also like to express our appreciation for the excellent cooperation we have had with the Workers' Education Branch. It has always provided excellent technical support and the means necessary to provide training and information through seminars organised by our Federation.

I should also like to stress the excellent work that has been carried out by the Workers' Relations Branch. Thanks to their advice, experience and knowledge of procedures, these officials have always been able to advise and assist workers' delegates in coping with their problems.

Within the framework of industrial activities, we participated at and cooperated in the work of the 12th session of the Inland Transport Committee. We would like to draw attention to one of the important aspects discussed during this meeting, which was also discussed by the Director-General in his Report at the 78th Session of the International Labour Conference: The dilemma of the informal sector.

The Inland Transport Committee insisted on the need to pursue the programme and the studies carried out by the ILO concerning this sector and to include a detailed study on the situation of workers in inland transport – with particular emphasis on developing countries. This request certainly should be examined in great depth.

The political climate throughout the world has changed in a very spectacular manner. Democracy has made great steps forward. However, we cannot fail to observe numerous problems, deviations, limitations, contradictions and corruption. A large number of democratic experiences have been limited to mere formal freedoms and have succumbed in the absence of justice – particularly countries in which the rule of law has been eroded. If there is no rule of law, there is simply no democracy.

The Director-General was therefore right to raise the question of how the various participants involved in the democratic process might channel these changes towards the establishment of more open and just societies. For our federation, democracy is an act through which peoples can take responsibility themselves and for their own ends in order to be responsible for their own destiny.

The existence of political institutions which are democratic and pluralist are the most obvious characteristics of democracy. Pluralism, freedom of opinion, freedom of the press and freedom of political parties and other organised groups – such as union organisations – are as vital to democracy as are independence and impartiality of justice.

We believe that the ILO is one of the best instruments to promote democracy. It should base its action on promoting social reforms which will create a structure for political and economic change and the war against want. The ILO should therefore continue its action to assist countries in the process of change and those countries which are already more stable. This should take a number of forms: the respect for basic human rights, particularly in the working world; the strengthening of activities aimed at promoting the ratification and application of standards and Conventions; the promotion of a market economy with a social dimension; the strengthening of tripartism and collective bargaining within its midst, by providing support for the members and labour institutions.

Trade unions are particularly concerned by the respect for basic human rights because, without them there can be no normal exercise of union rights.

These rights involve the right of the individual to freedom and safety and protection against arrests and arbitrary detention which frequently take place. Let us look at the example of Taiwan, where there are union leaders imprisoned at present.

The ILO should therefore strengthen its action and intervene when it is obvious that fundamental human rights are being flouted.

It should also be ready to assist and intervene when, as in the case of South Africa, workers have to correct the effects of discriminating policies vis-a-vis certain groups of the population which are victims of apartheid.

Respect and the application of standards and Conventions, whether they be international or national, certainly warrants full attention.

We see that in numerous countries and industries, governments and employers are determined to erode the advantages that have obtained in collective bargaining.

This is the case in Venezuela where seamen are struggling to regain the advantages they had in the past.

This is also the case in Bulgaria, where the Minister of Transport does not respect his commitments and wants to introduce changes in remuneration and working conditions, in spite of the Conventions that have been ratified.

ILO action would not be complete if it did not encourage and promote market economy with a social dimension. Jobs are the main way in which people can cover their basic needs and satisfy their desires for personal fulfilment.

We have already raised the problem of structural adjustment policies. The ILO should be particularly attentive to the consequences of incorrect application of these policies which can only aggravate poverty.

On the question of tripartism, it is necessary to promote a structure for dialogue and participation to enable the various social partners to discuss different choices and demonstrate that these choices have been decided upon in the general interest.

Decisions are far too frequently imposed on social partners or accepted by some of them, which blurs any distinction between them and state structures. An effective and efficient pluralism would correct this type of situation.

Minority organisations, although less representative, must not be set to one side. They may represent a real need and be a vital component of democracy.

At this point, I would like to say that it is sometimes difficult for countries to live in a real state of pluralism.

Within the ILO, our organisation – one of the three world organisations that groups transport personnel – was refused the right to take part in the Tripartite Subcommittee on Seafarers' Welfare of the Joint Maritime Commission, which took place from 10 to 15 October 1991.

We believe that the priority aims the ILO has set itself in the immediate future are the most important: assistance to democracy; assistance in the struggle against poverty; and workers' protection. The ILO should therefore do its very best to implement these objectives.

These are fully subscribed to by International Federation of Trade Unions of Transport Workers which pledges its full support to ILO actions and is prepared to participate in the construction of a better world for all of us.

U HLAING (Government delegate, Myanmar) – On behalf of the Myanmar delegation and on my behalf, I am pleased to extend to the President our sincere congratulations on his unanimous election to this high office. It is indeed a well-deserved election, and I am confident that under his presidency the deliberations of this august assembly will come to a successful conclusion.

Firstly, allow me to commend the Report of the Director-General. The Report clearly shows the unremitting efforts of the Organisation, directed towards improving the social welfare of the workers – an ever-growing and ever-demanding task.

The Director-General has, in his wisdom, chosen the theme Democratisation and the ILO in Part I of his Report. We generally share the view of the Director-General that the democratisation process is a very delicate and complex matter, and that it is c cult to get a conclusive answer to the related q tions. However, we feel that consideration of the ject is appropriate and timely.

The Organisation has spared no effort in adap its activities to the dramatic changes taking plac the world's political arena. It is heartening to that discussions on the need for adjustment to man resources development will be held during session. I would like to congratulate the Direc
General for his excellent Report and the topic has given us for reflection.

During more than 70 years of its existence, m bership of the ILO has increased from the in number of 45 to 158. These member nations h

In this regard, I would like to state that there

Myanmar we are endeavouring to achieve all-ro own efforts. The State Law and Order Restora time when the nation-building task can gain mon

In Myanmar the democratisation process has b

May I touch briefly on certain achievements w have contributed towards the social betterment the working people. There has been an unprece

One can witness the great strides made in const country.

Thanks to the all-out development efforts of Government, the border areas where national r reside have now flourished and have become ac sible to every economic, social and cultural ser provided by the Government. These areas wer one time under terrorist groups where transporta and communication had been almost cut off for eral years. The development of border areas has been augmented by the service of those who h graduated from the University for the Developm of National Races. The UDNR graduates will contribute towards the educational development of the national races and will thus strengthen the spirit of union among them to preserve national solidarity.

To provide shelter for the homeless and improve the living conditions of the poor, new satellite towns have been set up by the Government in recent years. Thousands of people including workers are now enjoying the fruits of the Governments ambitious plan which was inspired by goodwill.

The other important step taken by the Government is the adoption of programmes for the utilisation of fallow and virgin lands. These programmes will substantially increase employment opportunities in the agricultural and livestock breeding sectors of the economy.

Myanmar is ready to participate in the international endeavours which will have positive effects on the world community. We are deeply involved in combating the problem of drug abuse. Since our statement made last year from this rostrum, we have elaborated on our activities and achieved a lot in this area.

Continuous efforts are being made in Myanmar to reduce the illicit production, supply, trafficking and demand for drugs. Vast areas of poppy fields are destroyed every year. Moreover, drug refineries, large quantities of narcotic drugs and drug-producing paraphernalia seized by the authorities have also been destroyed in the presence of representatives from international agencies including the United Nations International Drug Control Programme and the diplomatic corps.

On the other hand, prevention, treatment and rehabilitation programmes are in full swing as part of our attempt to reduce demand. These activities fully demonstrate Myanmar's determination to make a significant contribution to the success of global efforts to combat the drug menace within the framework of the recently proclaimed United Nations Decade against Drug Abuse.

Myanmar shares the view of the United Nations on the important role of children and that their survival, protection and development is the prerequisite for future development of humanity, as they are citizens of tomorrow's world. Thus, Myanmar promptly ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child last July. On that day, Myanmar also signed the world declaration on the survival, protection and development of children. Presently, there are several pieces of legislation in Myanmar which include provisions for the protection of the rights of children.

I would here like to stress what the Government is doing in the field of national legislation. There are numerous acts, including labour acts, which were enacted during different periods. All of this legislation is now under review. The central body for scrutinising existing Acts has been formed to examine those which need to be repealed or amended and also to recommend new Acts. As a result, new labour legislation, where necessary, will be enacted to reflect the changing situations.

Before concluding, I would like to touch briefly on matters relating to human resources development. Myanmar is taking part in the regional HRD activities of ESCAP by endorsing the Jakarta Plan of Action on Human Resources Development. Myanmar has designated a national focal point to deal with the Commission on this matter. We are very much interested in the Commission's approach to HRD, particularly with regard to the enhancement of the quality of life of the people.

Finally, allow me to express my hope that this session of the Conference will devote its work, in a spirit of constructive and active cooperation, to laying a solid foundation and drawing up clear guidelines for future activities of the ILO.

Original – Arabic: Mr. MOUBARAK (Minister of Health; Minister of Labour and Social Affairs a.i., Iraq) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! On the occasion of the first day of the feast of Id al-Adha, I would like to welcome all the Muslim and Arab delegations and wish peace and stability to all countries of the world.

I would first like to congratulate the President on his election to the Chair of this session of the Conference. I am confident that his experience and competence will guarantee success for our work and will lead to resolutions which will address the items on the agenda and promote the principles and the objectives of our organisation and promote the common interests of the three social partners in our countries.

I would also like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election and bring the greetings of our guide, President Saddam Hussein, for the full success of this session.

This Session of the Conference is being held at time when the international situation is extremely complicated and dangerous. Following the end of the cold war, which set East against West, events have multiplied on the international scene and a new world order has appeared which has confirmed the hegemony of a small number of countries. These countries have intervened in the internal affairs and have seized control of world economic institutions and a few international organisations to attain their objectives and serve their own interests. Such a situation only increases economic imbalance, widens the gap between the rich countries and the poor countries and worsens the debt of the countries of the South.

In this context, international legality has been used as a pretext to wage a total war against Iraq which left tens of thousands of victims amongst the population and led to the destruction of the country's social and economic institutions.

The choice by the Director-General of Democratisation and the ILO as the subject of his Report this year is a timely one because this is a matter of capital importance to all countries of the world. True democracy allows peoples to exercise their basic rights and freedoms within a legal and institutional framework which guarantees these rights and freedoms and which is the basis of such essential principles as equality and social justice. The Government of my country has sought to establish democracy and create constitutional institutions. Since 1970 it promulgated the Act respecting the National Council, which regulated elections during several parliamentary sessions, contributed to the preparation of various policies and examined and adopted a number of bills and regulations. It was also about to finish the text of the Constitution of the country when the aggression against my country prevented the fulfilment of this objective.

The sustained efforts to create a legal and institutional framework for democracy continue. Thus my Government promulgated Act No. 30 of 1991 respecting political parties, which establishes the multiparty principle and makes democracy the basis of all trade union activity. Furthermore, the Government of my country has examined the problems concerning workers and employment and has published the texts of bills and regulations drawn up through democratic dialogue between the three social partners. In the same way, almost ten years ago, we set up a Committee of Tripartite Consultation in which the abovementioned social partners are represented and the purpose of which is to examine international labour Conventions and Recommendations and to take the necessary measures for their ratification and application.

At a time when the world is experiencing a legitimate aspiration towards democracy and the respect of human rights, we see that States which are extending their hegemony over the Security Council are imposing the adoption of resolutions which practically deprive people of these rights. These States are imposing the adoption of successive resolutions which continue the iniquitous economic blockade against my country although the causes which led to its imposition have now disappeared. These States pay no heed to the consequences of this blockade which has resulted in a terrifying lack of foodstuffs and medicine, the spread of epidemics and disease resulting in the death of tens of thousands of persons including a large number of workers. These States pay no heed to the dangers and catastrophes which are threatening millions of Iraqis or to the rates of death and disease which have increase significantly, particularly amongst children, infants, the old and women. All this is a flagrant contradiction of the provisions of international conventions and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and is a violation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which was only recently concluded although the iniquitous resolutions of the United Nations had excluded from the embargo, medicines, foodstuffs, milk for babies and other humanitarian products.

The tragic consequences of the blockade are not limited to these areas but also affect the labour movement and production, since many plants have come to a partial or complete stop because of the lack of energy, raw materials and spare parts. The social partners of my country are thus in an impasse and this is why it is essential for the ILO to carry out its responsibilities and intervene to ensure the lifting of the blockade which will enable us to ensure the normal exercise of work and production. It must also give its support and assistance in all forms to the workers on the basis of the principles and objectives enshrined in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia. This would be consonant with the proposals set forth by the Director-General in his Report concerning the preparation of programmes to strengthen employment and fight against unemployment in such cases. We call upon our Conference, in its tripartite structure, to demand the lifting of this unjust embargo to allow my country to exploit its resources and give its people a decent standard of living and satisfy the needs of work and production.

The agenda of this session includes a number of items which are important to work and workers, in particular the protection of workers' claims in the event of insolvency of the employer. This item makes provision for practical and just measures and thus we support the adoption of the proposed Convention and Recommendation to guarantee these rights. We should like on this occasion to point out that the national legislation of Iraq considers workers' claims as privileged claims.

The question of structural adjustment and human resources development which also appears on the agenda is of special importance to the social and economic recovery of the developing countries. Although we support the conclusions of the report in question concerning the optimum use of human resources, we would like to emphasise the need to increase international, material and technical support for developing countries to enable them to adapt their teaching and training programmes in line with their needs.

As regards the Special Report of the Director-General on the Declaration concerning action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the Conference in 1988, my country believes that it is still too early to repeal or amend this declaration and that pressure should continue to be brought to step up changes in South Africa, abolish the policy of apartheid and achieve full equality between the African people and the White majority. We ask the ILO to continue its assistance to the people of South Africa and its support of democratic trade unions to guarantee the rights of all workers of South Africa.

In concluding my statement I would like to welcome those States which have rejoined the family of the ILO. I am convinced that these States, in their tripartite structure, will contribute with other member States to achieving the objectives and principles of the Organisation and the consolidation of freedom and progress in the world.

May the peace, Mercy and grace of God be with you.

Original – Spanish: Mr. CARBONE RICO (Minister of Labour and Social Security, Uruguay) – On behalf of the Uruguayan delegation and on my own behalf, I congratulate the President on his election to guide the proceedings of the 79th Session of the International Labour Conference and wish him success in his task.

The Report of the Director-General proposes to us this year a subject of fundamental political importance – Democratisation and the ILO – and it has the virtue of restating the essential values that gave rise to the Organisation.

In effect, the Report asks us a number of questions. How can we work for greater democracy and social justice? What part can the social partners play in this context? What is the role of the ILO in regard to strengthening the rule of law? How can we fight against discrimination that is incompatible with democracy?

Democracy means government by the people and it means the management of public affairs by all individuals. Democratisation also means respect for human rights and the guarantee of the exercise of democratic freedoms. To democratise means to fight against all forms of discrimination.

In our country, Uruguay, there is a system of tolerance and we Uruguayans are proud that we have given refuge to numerous waves of immigrants who have received the same opportunities as our own nationals and have in turn responded to our generous hospitality by mingling their blood and their efforts with the people.

We have always felt among ourselves that we were all of equal worth. This feeling of equality is the basis of Uruguayan society, something which we could define as a community of sentiments and values.

But in the world today sadly we find a marked increase in xenophobic nationalism, a recrudescence of racial resentments, a dwindling participation of individuals in political and social organisations and a widening gap between development and underdevelopment, the spread of ideas which seem directed towards exulting individualism.

This feeling, which is so far removed from healthy patriotism and which many call nationalism, is referred to in the Encyclical Mater et Magistra which states that there are yet other obstacles to the formation of a more just and better structured world within universal solidarity. We refer to nationalism and racism. It is natural that communities that have recently recovered their political independence should be jealous of a still fragile national unity and should endeavour to protect it. It is also normal that nations of ancient culture should be proud of their historical heritage but these legitimate sentiments need to be sublimated into the universal charity which encompasses all members of the human family. Nationalism and racism isolate peoples contrary to their true interest and their true good.

We might also recall what was said by Mr. Sidibé, the former head of the International Labour Standards Department at last year's session of the Conference that it is vital that political freedom and the movement towards the market economy should not be identified by those who should be its actors and its beneficiaries with unbearable stringencies or with new arbitrary approaches.

The disappearance of regimes oppressive of human dignity cannot lead us to an easy conviction that the model of capitalist development, as it is presented to us, will ensure democracy and freedom, that it suffices to stake everything on the prosperity of the central economies so that in the course of time they will also grant us part of their prosperity and thereby ensure social justice, and that détente between East and West will guarantee universal peace. There is need for a campaign of solidarity.

That solidarity which the hour requires presupposes an increase in technical assistance to combat and overcome xenophobic nationalism, racism and isolating individualism.

That solidarity also means fairer terms of international trade so that the move towards the market economy is not be a mere slogan to justify larger profits for the few to the detriment of the needs of the many.

On this level restrictions on the freedom of international trade must be increasingly denounced as representing a grave failure of international solidarity. The ILO must use its influence to make possible a greater commercial opening up of the wealthy countries.

The Director-General draws our attention in his Report to the quest for consensus and the participation of social actors in shaping the fundamental decisions of the nation. It seems clear that the principle of choice by consensus has clearly triumphed. The authoritarian approach by administrations and Governments has ceased to be current coin and is no longer tolerated by our societies.

It is clear that representative democracy has prevailed with the governments elected by the people for specific periods of time and with room allowed for political minorities in the collective bodies that wield power.

The exercise of that power is not compromised when the Government heeds the views of the social partners. It has to act as the final arbitrator because that is its responsibility under the Constitution. Otherwise it would be abdicating its rights. Put in the effort to guide the advance of the national prosperity it must bear in mind the other centres of power in society.

The hour requires us to make a national issue of growth and stability, of the fight against budget any deficits and against inflation. A good example in Uruguay has been the process of economic integration which in our country has been a matter of overriding national interest above party and sectoral concerns. Thus the Asunción Treaty gave rise to an historic vote in our Parliament which was adopted by almost all members.

To democratise, however, also means giving equal opportunity to every one and the best way of doing that is to foster the spirit of enterprise, to free initiative as the Director-General proposes. The hour requires the development of a market economy, without it being forgotten, of course, that the market economy and social justice have to be compatible and mutually enriching.

The hour requires job creation and the creation of new enterprises. We have to ensure that our citizens understand that they have opportunity to make their own way, that the task will be risky, but that nevertheless the environment will reward their success and not unfairly punish their venture. This new spirit of enterprise and participation in the economic adventure, in economic democracy is certainly a matter for the training of businessmen, but also for education at an early age. The Report rightly notes that the new environment must provide opportunities for small and medium-sized enterprises and support for initiatives which create self-sustaining economic units.

Democracy is also arriving in the more specific world of labour relations. The collective determination of conditions of work may also require change: the decentralisation of bargaining and the respect of the functions of the trade union organisations. The application here, too, of the principle of subsidiarity which carried the day as the central State divests itself of responsibility for the entire productive effort, when it is left to the occupational sectors themselves to negotiate collective agreements determining the standards applicable to a particular activity. The highest level of government, the one furthest removed from the individual, must take due account of the action of the lower bodies. In at these lower levels of organisation we can find and excellent channel for the participation of human beings. The object of democratisation is that everyone should feel that they have a share and that this share makes everyone his own master, responsible for the common weal but solidary with his neighbour.

It would seem that the historic moment of interdependence of men and nations requires a new approach to development and cooperation. On the one hand there is the urgent need to understand that development and social justice must be made increasingly compatible.

On the other hand there is a need to understand the nature of the globalisation of the economy and in general, social relation at all levels, which are creating an interdependent of world where the problems of poverty, discrimination, the environment, health and working conditions affect everyone altogether independently of national values. These are global problems and it is logical that institutions that encompass the entire world must mark out the policies and strive for the attainment of the respective ideals.

Today, then, institutions such as the ILO are experiencing a fresh vitality in their mandate and in their objectives. The aspirations of those who drafted the Declaration of Philadelphia are still alive. Millions of human beings are looking to us here and it would be a scandal if we were to disappoint them. Let us remember that every day we are working on behalf of social justice, for the respect of basic human rights which it is our responsibility to uphold.

We have heard the voice of tolerance. We have banished the ideologies of exclusion. Let us redouble our efforts to build a world where everyone can live a decent life.

(Mr. Solárzano Martínez takes the chair.)

Original – Italian: Mr. GRYPO (Under-Secretary of State for Labour, Italy) – This Session of the International Labour Conference and especially the central theme of our debate bear witness to the important role of the ILO in the changes now under way in the world.

Indeed, in order to assert the universal worth of democracy we need concrete and effective social policy measures, which are not complementary to democracy, but an integral part of its development. In our view, by definition democracy must be based on a reliable set of rules, involving the participation of different parts of society, including the most vulnerable and marginalised groups.

It has quite rightly been said that democracy cannot be understood as a kind of privilege specific only to the rich countries. On the contrary it must be present wherever poverty calls for policies of social justice and equality of opportunity to reach a social consensus based on the principles of solidarity and to improve living and working conditions for the whole of society.

It is precisely the experience of our advanced societies which teaches us that fundamental truth, that the constitution of politically stable democracies goes hand in hand with the formal rules which guarantee individual and collective freedom, and with the active participation of people from all walks of life, public and private.

We are therefore convinced that the transitions and adaptations of the means of action which are taking place at the moment in many regions of the world confirm the need for a contribution of international organisations. Therefore this reinforces their role of support. This is particularly true for the ILO, as the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, observed when describing the main line of action in his Report. To carry out the planned programmes and initiatives, cooperation must continue with other international organisations, and particularly with the World Bank and with the International Monetary Fund. At the same time, we must highlight the specific character of the ILO by giving their due to social policies and the affirmation of fundamental human rights. By underlining the particular mandate of our Organisation, we can make an effective, efficient and decisive contribution in defining a new and better social equilibrium.

It is up to the ILO to interverne by supporting inter alia bilateral initiatives, which the Italian Government considers especially important, so that the independence and weight of social change can be recognized within the global transformations. Similarly, it is up to the ILO to ensure that the price of the development policies is not excessively high for anyone. We must be conscious that the cost and the individual sacrifices, beyond a certain limit, will become social costs, capable of undermining and weakening democracy at its roots. For instance, unemployment has a serious negative impact on worldwide demand, and also on the credibility of democratic institutions.
